I maintain that the market value of a licence is fairly represented by the Schedule A valuation, or would be so represented if the premises were properly assessed. The noble Viscount was quite correct in saying that the Schedule A valuation corresponded to the rack-rent of the premises, but that rack-rent represents what a man is prepared to pay for such premises with the special advantages which he gets from the fact that a licence is attached to them; and, therefore, that is a fair basis to take when you are estimating the loss in the value of those premises when the licence is taken away. What I think the noble Viscount forgot is that the rateable value of the premises is the basis taken for assessing the payments into the compensation fund, and as the law works at the present moment an unfair distinction is drawn between the publican of a free house and the publican of a tied house for this reason—that in both cases the rateable value of the premises is taken as the basis for their contributions to the compensation fund, but a different basis is taken when compensation is to be paid. The brewer is able to reduce his assessment by charging less to his tenant in the form of rent and more in the shape of the price of his liquor, and, therefore, he pays less into the compensation fund than a free tenant does; but when his turn comes to take out of the compensation fund he claims compensation not only for the reduced value of his premises but also for the loss of his wholesale profits. Therefore he contributes less than the free publican and obtains more. These wholesale profits are the only item which is not included in the Schedule A valuation, and I maintain that they ought not to be taken into account when we are considering what compensation ought to be given, because in a great many cases the wholesale profits are not lost at all when a licence is taken away. I had a good example of this brought before me this year when the licence of a tied house was going to be taken away under the Act of 1904, and in Court the representative of the brewing firm who owned the house said to one of our trust company representatives: "I am obliged to oppose the taking away of this licence, but, as a matter of fact, it is not going to do us any damage, because I shall receive £2,000 compensation for that licence, and I shall not lose the sale of a barrel of beer by the loss of it." In that £2,000 was calculated a certain proportion of the wholesale profits of the brewer, whose representative admitted that he was not going to lose a barrel of beer by the transaction. We have heard a good deal about robbery under this Bill. I do not like such rhetorical phrases, and I am not going to call this robbery of the State, but in operations of this kind which are going on under the law to-day all over the country there is something going on which is very much like taking money under false pretences from the State. For these reasons, My Lords, I hold that the basis of compensation under this Bill is a just and equitable one, and it is the same basis as that which is chosen for contributions to the compensation fund.

But when I come to the number of years purchase of the Schedule A valuation, I confess this strikes me as entirely inadequate. When you think of the source of this compensation fund, when you remember that it is paid out of the pockets of the trade; that it is, as has been admitted on both sides of the House, a compulsory insurance fund; it strikes me as somewhat shabby—I can use no other word—to exact as high and it may be higher premiums than heretofore, and then when the licence is taken away to give compensation which is totally inadequate for the loss. I am speaking now of the number of years purchase of the annual licence value given by the Bill. I have gone into these figures very carefully, and I have considered them in relation to the houses of which I have some knowledge under various trust companies, and I find that before the Kennedy judgment was delivered the number of years purchase of the licensed value of a house given by the Inland Revenue authorities under the Act of 1904 was something between twenty and twenty-four years purchase. After careful consideration of actual figures I say that nothing short of twenty-one years purchase of the Schedule A value of a licence would give adequate compensation to a licence-holder, and if we had gone into Committee I should have been prepared to bring forward an Amendment to raise the compensation payments to this amount. This is a matter of detail which could have been settled in Committee, and I very much regret that no opportunity is to be given to us for discussing a matter of this sort, which, although it is a detail, is very important, and I maintain that it would have been perfectly competent for your Lordships if we had read this Bill a second time to have dealt in any way you thought fit with the question of compensation. I confess that I am very much disappointed that no such opportunity is to be afforded.

There is one other part of this Bill which raises the question of justice or equity, and it is that part which establishes a time-limit to existing licences. The Bill as it stands proposes that the compensation levy and the compensation payments should run over a period of fourteen years; that at the end of that time they should cease; that the licences which survive should be renewed for a further period of seven years, and that at the end of that period, twenty-one years in all, all claims to their renewal should cease and the State should have absolute discretion as to their disposal. I admit that this additional seven years, in the form in which it appears in the Bill at the present moment, is but a poor concession. It does not contain that element which is absolutely essential to a time-limit if it is to be consistent with justice, viz., fixity of tenure. But this again was a matter which was entirely within your Lordships' discretion. This seven years tenure as at this moment proposed is limited by two facts—the discretion of the justices during those seven years and the operation of local veto machinery. But it would have been perfectly competent for your Lordships, if we had gone into Committee, to sweep away both those limitations. There was nothing whatever to prevent it, and if you had done that you would have got a time-limit which, in principle at any rate, would have corresponded with that which Mr. Balfour himself and speakers on the front Opposition bench have declared to be just and equitable. There might still have been a question as to whether the number of years was long enough or not, but the number of years of the time-limit is only a detail which, I cannot help thinking, is capable of adjustment if we could only agree upon the principle of it. That is all I want to say about the question of interests and equity. I have been obliged to deal with it on broad lines. There are many details which I should have liked to have discussed, and should have been prepared to do so if opportunity had occurred, but they are details more fitted for the Committee stage of the Bill.

Now I want to come to the other great question which is raised by this Bill, the question of temperance. This Amendment, and I think almost every speech by which it has been advocated, declares that the Bill is going to do nothing for temperance. I think that in almost every speech which I have heard in favour of the Amendment the speaker has said: "I entirely fail to see what this Bill is going to do to advance the cause of temperance." If I were anxious to score a debating point I might point out to the House that the Amendment is asking us to believe that all the temperance organisations in this country who, with singular unanimity, have accepted this Bill in principle; that the right rev. Primate and his colleagues on that bench, who have had some personal experience of temperance work; that men like my noble friend Lord Peel, who has given years of thought to this subject; that all these people know less about the question of temperance and how it will be affected by this Bill than do the noble Lords who are going to follow the noble Marquess into the lobby. It may be so, but it is making rather a large demand upon our credulity. Again, I might ask, when I remember the speech made by Lord Halsbury last night, what are we to think of the zeal in the cause of temperance of a man whose only contribution to this debate on that subject was to remind the House that over-eating was as serious as over-drinking, that beer was part of the necessary diet of the working-man, and that 6d. a day was, after all, not a very large sum for a man to spend in drink. Over-eating as serious an evil as over-drinking! My Lords, is not there something rather grim in that pleasantry when we think of the classes who will be affected by this Bill? If there is an evil connected with food in that class, I think it arises rather from under-feeding than from over-eating. But I do not want to make mere debating points against those with whom, though I disagree, I do so with great reluctance, and I am quite prepared to take up the challenge which has been thrown down, that this Bill is going to do nothing for the cause of temperance, and I am perfectly prepared to give my reasons for thinking differently.

It is assumed by those who use this argument that the Act of 1904 did all that was necessary for the cause of temperance, that it is working well and that no amendment of the law is required. Now, without denying that the Act of 1904 did certainly, in some respects, advance the cause of temperance, I just want to bring to the notice of your Lordships one or two points in which that Act had a contrary effect. The first point I want to call your attention to is one which I do not think was contemplated at the time when it was passed, viz., that it has taken away from the justices of petty sessional divisions the power of imposing conditions on the renewal of existing licences. I will give you two illustrations of the effect which the Act has had in this respect. Before the year 1905 the Liverpool justices found that they were able to do a good deal for the cause of temperance and for the public good, by imposing conditions as to the structure of licensed premises and the conditions of trade carried on in them. The neighbouring justices of Birkenhead being impressed with what had been done in Liverpool decided to take the same course, and the conditions which they sought to impose were certainly not unreasonable ones and were solely in the public interest. They included such conditions as that no intoxicating liquor should be sold on credit, that no intoxicating liquor should be supplied to any child under fourteen, that the licensee should devote his whole time to his business, and that back doors were to be kept locked. But they found that the Act of 1904 debarred them from imposing those conditions. The case was taken into Court and it was decided that since the passing of that Act the justices had no power whatever to impose those conditions.

Then there was an even stronger case, the case of the "Sun Inn" at Warasli, in which the Fareham justices discovered that a large number of Sunday trippers were being served with drink on Sunday in certain houses during the hours of closing, although they were in no sense bona fide travellers. They therefore summoned the licensee before them and explained that they did not wish this class of person to be served. The licensee, having heard what the magistrates had to say, agreed to the conditions imposed and said they would see that they were carried out. On the next Sunday after this decision of the bench was given, the tenants of the four houses concerned endeavoured to carry out their instructions, but the owner of the houses, the representative of the brewing firm, came down and ordered his publicans to serve these people as they had been doing hitherto and the publicans did as they were told. The magistrates applied to the Home Office for authority to enforce their decision, and were told that they had no power to do anything at all. Those are illustrations of the way in which this Act, though quite unintentionally, has had a real detrimental effect, and the remedy is to be found in Clause 22 of this Bill.

There is one other way in which this Act is working contrary to the interests of temperance. The authors of the Act of 1904 will remember, I think, that Clause

The Earl of Lytton.

4 of that Act was intended to prevent in future the growth of that monopoly which Lord Salisbury described as an outrage and which Lord Lansdowne called an unhealthy excrescence. It was intended that, at any rate, with regard to new licences, the State should be free to deal with them as it pleased. But the practice has grown up for justices under the Act of 1904 to grant licences, annually renewable licences, and at the same time to charge in some cases an enormous capital sum in respect of the monopoly value of the premises. I was looking through the Blue-book which is published each year of licensing statistics and I found that as much as £20,000 had been asked and paid for an annually renewable licence. This practice is one which is detrimental to the cause of temperance, because it imposes a financial burden upon a man who is just setting up a new business and compels him to recoup himself out of his trade to the extent of this capital charge before he can put any profit whatever in his pocket. It is detrimental to the cause of temperance, it is contrary to the public interest and opposed to the whole spirit of the Act of 1904, because it creates again, and in an aggravated form, that very claim to the perpetual renewal of a licence which Section 4 of that Act was intended to remedy. Here, again, the remedy is found in Clause 26 of this Bill which provides that in the case of an annual licence the monopoly charge is not in any instance to exceed the annual value of that licence.

In fact, every single clause in Part 3 of this Bill is of value, and would bring great benefit to the cause of temperance. I shall be answered, I know, that that part of the Bill is in the main non-controversial, and I welcome the suggestion that was made by Lord St. Aldwyn that this part of the Bill, at any rate, should be saved. What I want to insist upon is this, that just as no one would be justified in defending the Bill as an equitable measure without referring to Part 1 and 2, so also no one is justified in denouncing the Bill on the ground that it does nothing for temperance without saying something about Part 3, which contains all the valuable provisions to which I have referred. But I do not wish it to be thought that the value of this Bill from a temperance point of view is confined to Part 3. I come to what is admittedly the core and kernel of the Bill, viz., the clauses which deal with the reduction period and the time-limit, and here I want to say something about the value of reduction generally as a temperance measure. I attach the greatest possible importance to a policy of reducing the number of public-houses, but not upon the usual ground on which such a policy is advocated and on which it was advocated by the right rev. Primate in his speech last night, viz., the ground that every public-house is a temptation, that as you multiply temptations you multiply the chances and probabilities of excessive drinking, and that in proportion as you diminish temptations you promote the cause of temperance. I think the extent to which that is true is a debateable matter, and I, myself, do not attach very great value to a policy of reduction on that ground; but there is another aspect of the question which I feel is of the utmost importance, and it has been very forcibly brought to my notice in connection with the work of which I have had experience. The more I study this question the more convinced I am that the evils of intemperance, the bad habits and demoralisation which are attendant upon the sale of drink in public-houses, can be to a large extent either increased or diminished by the character of the house in which the liquor is sold, and I believe that view is shared very largely by noble Lords on this side of the House, if I may judge by the reception given a few days ago to Lord Lamington's Bill, and also by the speech of the noble Marquess in moving his Amendment. I believe there is a strong desire on this side of the House to improve the public-house; but what I want to point out is this, that the number of public-houses has a very great influence indeed upon their character, and that the multiplication of public-houses has, in the main, a demoralising effect upon the character of the houses. If you have only one public-house in any district you can trust to the good sense of those who use it to see that its reputation is kept up, that its high character is preserved, and that a high standard of public opinion prevails within its walls. But as you multiply rivals to that public-house so you diminish its power of doing good, and you increase its power to do harm, and when you get a state of affairs in which public-houses jostle one another together in the same street, as we have got not only in all our towns, but in many country districts throughout the land, then there is a certainty that a great many of those houses are doing incalculable mischief.

I have had instances of this brought very forcibly to my notice in my own neighbourhood. There is a village quite close to my own home a small country village in which there are no less than thirteen public-houses. They stand side by side, and in one case three abreast in the same street. The result of this excessive competition is that the publicans finding it extremely difficult to make a livelihood at all under such circumstances, have been forced, for the purposes of creating and retaining a trade, to compete with one another in offering very large rates of interest upon the savings of working men deposited with them as a sort of savings bank. In the town of Hitchin there is a house belonging to the trust company of which I am chairman. It is situated in a back street, and from its door you can count six or eight other public-houses. How can it be supposed that it is of any use to spend time and effort and money upon raising the character of this one particular house, in trying to make it a good, respectable place which will meet the needs of the respectable element of the population, when all those who, if you succeed, will be shamed out of your house, have only to turn next door and go into one of the other houses which are crowded together in the same street? It is from this point of view that I consider the question of reduction to be of the utmost possible importance.

Over and over again I have seen the evils of this excessive competition, and I am not the least impressed by Home Office Memoranda or statistics which are brought forward to explain the great sobriety of districts which are well served with public-houses. From the point of view of reduction this Bill is undoubtedly a great advance upon the existing law. It will accelerate the process, and that alone is a great gain to the cause of temperance. Moreover, the element of compulsion which is set up by this Bill will greatly strengthen the hands of the magistrates in fulfilling their duties. However much a local bench may be impressed with the value of a policy of reduction as a general principle they are faced with innumerable difficulties, technicalities and obstacles of one kind and another, when they come to consider which particular house they are to deal with. There is always some good reason why that particular house should be left, either it is structurally the best although badly managed, or else its management is excellent though it is an unsatisfactory building. It is not surprising that magistrates in a great many instances, resolve in despair to leave things as they are. The Bill will strengthen their hands in this particular matter by the element of compulsion which is provided, and it will give some assurance to those who believe in the value of this policy that, within a limited number of years, we shall have the public-houses of this country reduced to such a number as can effectively be controlled.

I come to the last principle in the Bill which is of the utmost value, and it is that, apart altogether from the question of redundant houses, it is desirable that the State should have the power—whether it exercised it or not will depend on the public opinion at any moment—to change, if it thinks fit, its whole policy in respect of licences. And since such a change of policy might entail either the extinction of licences in a particular neighbourhood or their transference from one set of holders to another, it is necessary that the State should give due notice of its intentions. That is the principle of what we call the time-limit, and Lord Rosebery was perfectly right when he said that that was the real question on which we were going to divide. This question of a time-limit, not the particular form it takes, not the number of years, but the fact of a time-limit at all, is the real root and essence of the whole matter. Those who vote for this Bill are going to vote for machinery which will enable the present system, some day or another, under some condition or another, to be brought to an end. Those who are going to vote for the Amendment are going to vote for keeping the present system perpetually in existence. ["No."] Noble Lords may say "No," but I would like to point out that it is perfectly impossible, under existing circumstances, unless machinery be brought in to enable the present licensing system to be brought to an end, that any temperance experiment on a large scale can be tried at all.

*EARL CROMER: Why "perpetually?"

*THE EARL OF LYTTON: Because no machinery exists.

*EARL CROMER: They can bring in another Bill.

*THE EARL OF LYTTON: Certainly there may be another Bill, and I hope if this Bill is rejected that there will be another Bill; but what I want to point out is that without some time-limit machinery—I do not care in what Bill it is introduced—it is impossible for the present system to be brought to an end. Let me give you an example. I and my right rev. friend the Bishop of Chester are interested in the public-house trust experiment. Other temperance reformers have other experiments which they would like to see introduced, but I prefer to deal with the one in which I am interested myself. Supposing that he and I and others who are interested in that experiment were successful in proving to a particular local authority the desirability of substituting our plan for the plan which is in force to-day; supposing that we convinced them that the trust public-house is better than the tied house: however impressed the local authority might be with our arguments and with the desirability of the change which we advocated, it would be utterly impossible for them to do anything to help us. The ground is occupied; the tied house is already in possession, and unless we contemplate the possibility at some time or another of getting rid of the tied-house system it is idle to talk about temperance reform at all. We are bound hand and foot in a way in which no other country is bound in this matter. There are private interests in the field, private interests so strong, so entrenched, that it is impossible to make room for any alternative system. We have got to get rid of these private interests, but we have got to get rid of them, I frankly admit, on equitable and fair terms. I think noble Lords will understand that on the question of compensation or of notice to be given, I, like the Bishop of London, have always insisted that I would consider any question of detail in that machinery. I do not care how many years we have to wait; I do not care what sum we have got to pay in compensation. What I do ask is that, whatever the price we have to pay, whatever the number of years we have to wait, let us, some day or another, bring to an end a system which is universally condemned as it is universally practised.

That is all I have to say on the Bill. I feel most deeply disappointed that we are not to have any opportunity of coming to close quarters with its details. If I thought that, even at this eleventh hour words of mine could have any effect on the situation, that it would be possible by compromise or negotiation for something out of this Bill to be saved, I would plead with the House as earnestly and with all the force that I could command that such compromise or negotiation should take place. But I feel it is too late for any words of mine to have such an effect. We are going to take leave of this Bill to-night. I do not agree with the right rev. Prelate the Bishop of London that never again will this subject be taken up. I agree rather with the noble Lord on the cross benches that we are at the beginning of a long series of Bills and negotiations on the subject. I have stated the reasons which prevent me from following the noble Marquess into the lobby, and I can only conclude by asking him to believe that my course of action is not dictated by any feeling of disloyalty to him or by any distrust of the motives which have led him to take the course which he has recommended to the House. I know the noble Marquess is perfectly sincere in the views which he holds and has recommended to the House, and if I cannot follow him, it is only because I differ from him conscientiously, but fundamentally, as to the effect the Bill is likely to have upon a cause to which I am deeply attached, and which I believe to be inseparably bound up with the welfare of this country.

LORD HARRIS: My Lords, starting from precisely the same standpoint, the desire to see temperance extended, as the noble Earl who has just sat down, I should come to a diametrically opposite conclusion as to the effect of this Bill. I am even less concerned with the trade than he is. I have absolutely no interest in it whatever; I have never been concerned either myself or as a trustee with any interest in any public-houses or any brewery. I start from an absolutely impartial standpoint, and I have come to the conclusion diametrically opposite to the noble Earl who has just sat down. I do not think this Bill will secure those advantages which he thinks it is certain to secure. I am going to confine my remarks to two practical points, those of the monopoly value and of the tied-house system, because I cannot help thinking that many most worthy people, people for whom one must have the highest possible respect because they are actuated by the highest motives, are under a delusion in regard to the great advantages that they think the State is going to secure under this Bill as regards these two points. The noble Earl, Lord Rosebery, last night said that this Bill was so voluminous, it raised so many principles, that he doubted whether many members of the Government on the front bench understood the whole of it. If that is true of members of the Government, is it not highly probable that there are a considerable proportion of those outside who call so loudly for the Bill who are quite as ignorant? What I venture to say is that upon those two points the advantages anticipated from this Bill will not be secured.

Let me ask you to cast your minds forward to the end of the seven years after the reduction period when the State has got to decide how these houses are to be managed—the 60,000 left. I challenge entirely the allegation that the State has parted with something extremely valuable. The State has always had within its power the right of taxing a house up to its full value. It has not done so, for very good reasons I have no doubt. What it has parted with is the reasonable expectation of continuity. That is all it has given away, and that is what has induced such an offer as the £18,000 to which the noble Earl on the cross benches referred last night. It was the expectation of continuity that has induced people to give these large sums for licences. But this Bill lays down that the licence is to be for only one year, and who is going to give a large sum for monopoly value for a year? The State is not going to make a great gain by a system of that kind, and I am very much afraid that the public, the population, are not going to gain very much as regards the character of the men who are going into the houses. What is going to be the temptation to a respectable man to go into this class of business when he has only a reasonable expectation of being left in the house for one year? And local option may do away with his home within the twelve months for which he has got the licence. What tempted respectable men to go into this business before, and what tempted people to give high prices for the licences, was the reasonable expectation that besides the business they had got a home in which they and their families were safe for a certain number of years. You are taking that away. By this Bill a man may be turned out of his home within a year.

As regards the tied-house system the noble Earl below me believes that that system will be done away with by this Bill. I am pretty sure that it will not. Who is going to pay for these not very valuable rights in the future—rights that may be taken away at any moment? I should think it is extremely probable that whoever gets the licence will be either a brewer himself or under an arrangement with a brewer for selling that particular brewer's beer. I do not see anything whatever in the Act which is likely to prevent the tied-house system going on, and in urban areas I confess I do not see very much harm about that system. My experience, both from administering Licensing Acts and from what I hear, is that the public is a very good judge of what is good beer and they go to the house which sells good beer, and if a publican is selling bad beer his house falls off in trade. My opinion is that at the end of twenty-one years under this Act the more powerful brewers will make arrangements amongst themselves what they shall hold and will arrange with the licensee of each house that he shall take their liquor. I am very much afraid the effect will be trusts such as our cousins in America are now trying to extirpate—a concentration of capital, a concentration of power in the hands of certain brewers. If that is the result the power of the trade will certainly not be diminished.

I have had to administer the Act of 1904, and I do not know that I have come to quite the same conclusion as the noble Earl below me as to what it is that makes a public-house successful. I have had cases before me which have led to the conclusion that it has more to do with the popularity of the owner than with the comfort of the house. I have had cases of houses which have been condemned by the licensing committees because they were inadequate for the proper comfort of the public, but the business done by those houses has far surpassed that of many superior houses in the neighbourhood, and I attribute it, and it is attributed by those who have had long experience, simply to the popularity of the man. I cannot quite follow my noble friend's exposition of the method of calculating the compensation under the present system. He submitted that it was upon the value of the house and not as a part of the business. The valuation at present is based upon barrelling. That is part of the business, and it is upon the business done that the value of the house is now estimated.

Apart from holding the objection already raised as to the injustice of the resumption clause, I do not believe that this Act at the end of the twenty-one years is going to produce the practical result which many who sympathise with it believe. If temperance is really the object of the party opposite—I do not question that it is—I venture to suggest to them that there are other ways of securing more rapid reduction of the the passage of this Bill such reduction would be remarkably slow. In my own experience as chairman of Quarter Sessions, I have come to the conclusion that the business of houses in places where houses have already been de-licensed undoubtedly goes up, that the houses that remain are doing a bigger business because some of the customers of the old houses are coming to them. The customers of the extinguished houses go to the other houses.

Both the right rev. Primate and the right rev. the Bishop of Hereford expressed a wish that some counteracting inducements could be put in the way of people other than the public-house. I think it was the Bishop of Birmingham who said he had often seen abroad whole families enjoying beer, or coffee, or lemonade, and he said he asked himself why we cannot have that sort of thing in England. There is nothing to prevent our having it in England if the State will assist in the establishment of such places. Attempts are made now to set up counter-attractions in the shape of tea-houses, but the competition is so great that it is almost too much for private finance. If you want to set up a place which will take away from the public-house a large number of those people who frequent it now, it must be with the assistance of the State, because otherwise the competition is too great. Such places would undoubtedly attract away from the public-house many people who are now compelled to go there, not because they want to drink, but because it is the only house open to the public, where a person can find shelter and warmth and food. I venture to suggest that as a far more rapid way of securing temperance than anything that would be secured by this Bill. I cordially agree with the Amendment, because I cannot help thinking that parts of this Bill are due to vindictiveness, and I am sure that some parts of it are not strictly just to those who have been induced by the action of the State to invest their money in this particular business.

VISCOUNT RIDLEY: My Lords, I have been deeply interested in the speech of Lord Lytton, who has a pecuand has not been afraid to put his principles into practice. That speech was the first which, in my opinion, has endeavoured to show what measures of temperance there are in the Bill. But what measures has the noble Lord discovered? I do not think that throughout his speech Lord Lytton singled out for commendation a single temperance measure of the Bill which could be described as one of its main features. He singled out for commendation provisions in Part 3, and he expressed a desire for certain Amendments of the Act of 1904 and of the state of the law as regards the Kennedy judgment, whilst he insisted upon the right of the State to change its system if it thought fit. None of these are the main principles of the present Bill. The main principles of the Bill are not concerned with Part 3, nor with Amendments of the 1904 Act, nor indeed, can we say with truth that the reduction of licences is in itself the main feature. The reduction of licences by statute is a principle which was established in the Act of 1904. The main features of this Bill are the means by which these results are sought to be attained, and against those methods the noble Earl, so far as I understood him, was as loud in protest as any Member of your Lordships' House.

What has been the conduct of His Majesty's Government as regards the Bill in this House, and how have they explained its temperance provisions or endeavoured to meet the wishes and aspirations of genuine temperance reformers in this matter? We have heard many able speeches upon the Bill, but none more able than that of the noble Lord, Viscount St. Aldwyn, who expressed warm approbation, for instance, of Part 3 of the measure. The House has heard many speeches from the right rev. bench and others expressing strong approbation of many parts of the Bill, whilst finding considerable fault with various radical principles in it. The House has heard expressions from many quarters of a real and genuine desire for temperance reform, a desire which this House has also shown by its past history. By the Bill which it passed in 1902, by the measure which it sanctioned in 1904, it has shown no mere lip-service to temperance reform, but a genuine desire to pass any well-considered and just measure.

But when the Government are asked to give some sort of indication in what way they would meet temperance reformers if they desired to make some Amendments to this Bill, they show that their zeal for temperance is not so great as their zeal for the confiscatory principles of this Bill. They have given no indication as to how they would be ready to meet the genuine desires of those who are strongly in favour of temperance reform and yet are opposed to some of the main confiscatory principles of the Bill. Does not the silence or immobility of the front bench justify the views of those who did not anticipate that the Government would in any way meet the legitimate desires to amend the Bill, and does it not indicate that those who proceeded to move Amendments in Committee would have met with no sympathy or consideration from the Government? The Earl of Lytton was desirous of giving the Bill a Second Reading, because he saw in it some principles making for real temperance reform. I do not share the noble Lord's views that the House could deal with the Bill in any way it thought fit in Committee. There is hardly an Amendment that I would wish to move to the Bill—and there are many such Amendments—which would not at once be met by the question of the financial relations between the two Houses. In view of past experience what reason have we for believing we should receive consideration in the matter? For the reason, if for no other, that we are unable to deal with the Bill as we think fit in Committee, I, for one, am obliged to vote against the Second Reading.

I regard the main principles of this Bill as more than Committee points. There is the proposition to impose a time-limit running concurrently with a levy upon the trade. The noble Earl talked of being ready to pay as much compensation as you like in order to change the conditions of this trade. But the compensation comes out of the pockets of the trade itself, and I venture to think his generosity was somewhat misplaced. The proposition as it stands can only be described as an insurance by certain members of the trade against the abolition of the houses. What the Bill really proposes is a raid upon the insurance fund established under the guarantee of Parliament in 1904, and a raid made at a time when the matter is further complicated by the chance of the loss of a licence through local option, and when the conditions of compensation are grievously spoilt by the new system of lumping together all compensation moneys, and by the feature which now appears in all Government Bills—that of a Department in Whitehall assuming control. Another feature which I cannot regard as a Committee point is the proposed change of the basis of compensation. It is a point which would be difficult to amend without coming into conflict with financial questions. It is not a Committee point, because it is one of the first principles in the Bill.

I would ask your Lordships to consider the way in which the Government met this point when it was put. It has been pointed out to them in debate and on other occasions that this new compensation scale would work intolerable hardship in a number of cases. How was that met? There was no attempt to prove that in those particular cases hardship would not arise, but it was said, "Yes; it is true the compensation will not be equal to the expenditure, but you must remember that the property was purchased at a time when it was well known there would be licensing proposals by the Government and when the speeches of Sir Thomas Whittaker and others were being heard all over the country, and people were very great fools to give so large a price when they knew the Liberal Government were to come into power." On that basis it would be possible for the State in future to take away any property at an unfair valuation. The House is familiar with the speeches by Mr. Snowden, and other Gentlemen who agree with him. There are Members of this House who have invested money in land and other forms of property. If at some future time there should exist a d property other than li basis to that proposec we should be told tl fools to have paid the have purchased when, according to the speeches of Mr. Snowden and others, our property was to have no value at all in the future.

That is what the Government are doing in this Bill. Their scale of compensation works intolerable hardships upon certain people who bo 'gh' their property in the open market in many cases not many years ago, and who will receive a bare pittance as compensation. They are told that they ought not to have bought it at such prices because Gentlemen were making speeches at the time which showed they could not expect to get those prices owing to future Government legislation. Principles of that kind in th Bill make it impossible for me to vote for the Second Reading. We have had no answer from the Government as to their willingness to see passed into law those parts of the Bill which can be described as non-contentious, and which certainly would command the adherence of all real temperance reformers. In default of any indication on the part of the Government to deal with those parts of the Bill, I, for one, am forced to vote against those first principles to which they obstinately adhere and which I conceive to do so great wrong to the individual. I, for one, would sooner this matter ended upon Second Reading; and I would rather see this question decided by your Lordships taking a stand in favour of the rights of the individual than by their having in the future to take a stand upon the rights of this House to introduce financial Amendments.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY (Lord FITZMAURICE): My Lords, I have more than once during the debate been inclined to think that the proper preface to it would have been that we should have asked the Clerk at the Table to read the Burial Service. The two principal speeches in opposition to the Bill might have been followed up by the familiar line, "I come to bury Cæsar, not to praise him." We on this side of the House feel that our task—always

Bill a first class funeral. You have assembled, I will not say a great number of mourners, but a large crowd, to attend the funeral. A great number of noble Lords have arrived who have not often honoured us with their presence. I can only hope that they have been carefully shepherded, and that none of them lost their way or will lose their way. That is not altogether an idle fear. I am an old Member of the House of Commons, and I remember an incident which I did not actually see, but which I heard of, and which, I think, some of your Lordships heard of. In 1869, when the Irish Church Disestablishment Bill came up before your Lordships' House, there was an occasion very like this when an enormous number of Peers were sent for by the late Lord Derby, to come and bury the Bill of Mr. Gladstone in this House. Lord Derby up to that time, or very nearly so, had had the power of carrying the Peers in his pocket, if I may say so, because he had had their proxies. But proxies had been abolished two years before and the result was that the Peers had to come personally if they intended to record their votes. One July afternoon a venerable person, slightly agricultural rather than political in appearance was observed sitting on the front bench below the gangway amongst the Members of the House of Commons. There had recently been a bye-election, and the Members of the House of Commons not unnaturally thought that this was the new Radical Member, but after a few moments the gentleman turned round to his neighbour and said: "Is this the House of Lords?" They said: "No, this is the House of Commons." It appeared he was a man, no doubt of fame and distinction in his own county, but who, up to that time, had always given his proxy to Lord Derby, and when he got into the central lobby, took the turning to the left instead of the turning to the right. Although he was a person of very Conservative opinions he was taken to be the new Radical Member and sat down below the gangway, whence, he was ejected, and made, not with shame to take a lower room, but with all dignity to take a seat in the Upper House.

Lord Fitzmaurice.

I cannot help thinking on this occasion that we have a great number of noble Lords here who may have been seen walking about in the streets of the City, but have not very frequently attended your Lordships' debates, and we are going to be "snowed under," if I may use that expression, by this tremendous invasion. Against that we feel that argument struggles in vain. But this is not one of the occasions, such as have happened no doubt frequently in this House, where we feel, not only that our numbers are few, but that we have had to acknowledge the great force and powers of that formidable front bench opposite upon which are ranged so many men of great eminence and experience in politics and in law, and who generally receive the support of the whole of their party and also, as a rule, that of the right rev. Prelates. I ask any impartial man who has sat in this debate, and has listened from first to last, where the weight of argument has been on this occasion, and where the views, the intelligent views, of the country have been? We have heard speech after speech from both sides of the House—one just now of notable ability from the noble Lord below the gangway—Lord Lytton. We have heard speech after speech from Peers who differ from us as a rule, from right rev. Prelates who are nearly always found in the opposite lobby to us, and they have said with striking unanimity and convincing argument that they consider a Second Reading ought to be given to this Bill. The debate has ranged over an enormous field. It was stated in the House of Commons by the late Prime Minister that one round in his indictment against this Bill was that it was not one Bill, but six Bills. My Lords, we defend it because it is six Bills, and not one Bill. We defend it because it is a great measure of temperance reform which attacks the problem not at one corner, but along the whole line, and if I may say so, upon every head. And therefore, if anybody, even the late Prime Minister, likes to try to injure it by saying that this is a Bill of six articles, all I can say is I do not object to that description.

But the main point which I want to consider on the Second Reading is whether there is a heads of the Bill, one great underlying principle upon which we can ask your Lordships to give the Bill a Second Reading. The answer to that was given in a speech yesterday, which I am sure will be widely read in the country, because all his speeches are, and will produce an even greater effect than is usual, great as that effect always is. I mean the speech of my noble friend Lord Rosebery when he pointed out that there was in this Bill the great underlying principle of the time-limit, and that it was according as you approved or disapproved of having a time-limit that you ought to record your vote, for or against this Bill. That is the argument which I venture again this evening to submit to your Lordships. Though I am told there is no hope of compromise, and that no negotiations are going on, until the noble Lord on the Woolsack is handed the figures I shall not believe that this House has rejected a great measure of temperance reform.

We have had the usual arguments, and we have heard the usual cry about oppression and injustice and hardship. I hope I shall never be found on any occasion deaf to the appeals of those who consider they are being treated with hardship or injustice in pecuniary matters, but I have always felt that in regard to this question there is no class that comes before Parliament which has so bad a prima facie case, when it raises the cry about financial oppression and injustice, as that which is interested in the sale of alcoholic liquors. We know that during the last year or two there has been a marked fall in the value of brewery shares; we know that for many years before there was a period of great and abounding prosperity, that enormous fortunes were made, and that the wealth of the great brewing industry of this country is second only to that great development of wealth which has been the result of the discovery of gold in South Africa. It is a common joke in London to say that the frontage of Park Lane, which is considered a sort of final test of re-against financial danger, seeing that since the case of Sharpe v. Wakefield at any rate, full notice has been received by the brewing and public-house industry of this country that there was great danger looming in the distance and gradually approaching nearer. As a matter of fact it would be untrue to say that the idea of insurance never did occur to them, because it is perfectly well-known that a few years ago a company was actually started and a circular issued with a view of forming an insurance business against the possible loss of licences under a change of circumstances, including a change of law. But as a matter of fact, the liquor interest, the brewing interest of this country, preferred the chance of being well entrenched in Parliament and making themselves, as Lord Rosebery said, as powerful, if not more powerful, than the law, rather than to resort, as they ought to have done years ago, to those ordinary methods of finance which every man of business resorts to if he has a property of possibly deteriorating character.

Do we fully realise the enormous power and privileges of this interest? I am not attacking them for having this property; they are just as well entitled to their great property as anybody else is to his small property. But why did they not years ago insure themselves against risk and against loss? They are specially favoured in many respects by the law. The licence duties in this country are extremely low. It is a commonplace that probably a large revenue could be extracted in aid of our taxes by a rise of the licence duties. The late Mr. Childers told me that he believed Mr. Gladstone, if he had succeeded in abolishing the income-tax in 1874, had intended to get the revenue he would have lost in that way. It is not only in regard to licence duties that the trade is in an extraordinarily favoured position. It has been acknowledged in these debates in both Houses of Parliament that in regard to rating, owing to the intricacies of our law of rating and to the enormous liquor interest has to carry every case al, they enjoy extra-and are in an extra-I think one of the ll which I specially recommend to the favourable attention of your Lordships is that which will do a great deal to induce the owners of licensed property themselves to be willing to go more thoroughly into the question of valuation, and to see if their property is properly assessed, because although they may lose in one way they will gain in another way, for the valuation comes in on the question of compensation.

It is true that these favours exist, but why? Because, I believe, it was recognised that although this was a great and powerful interest yet it was essentially a precarious one, because it rested upon an annual licence duty. You cannot have it both ways; you cannot claim that the licence which is only an annual interest shall be raised into something far higher, and shall receive protection from the law for a considerable period, or shall be treated as property in the full sense of the term, and that at the same time all these privileges which have gradually accumulated around the licensed interest because it is a precarious interest shall be continued. For that reason this Bill proposes to place the whole of these matters upon a business footing. It recognises the position of the licence-holder, not, indeed, as the owner of a freehold estate or property, but it recognises that he has an interest. It secures that interest for a certain number of years, it hedges it about with a contribution to a compensation fund, and at the same time holds out inducements, which, no doubt, a Valuation Bill will secure more fully in a short time, to holders of that class of property to get their property at its proper value on to the rate-book.

The whole, no doubt, of these arrangements will be placed under the control of the Commission. I have heard the cry raised, and it was echoed yesterday by the noble Earl, Lord Halsbury, that this Commission is, and will be, a great engine of power and oppression. We have heard about the slight placed upon local authorities, and how there would be three Commissioners sitting in London disposing of the rights and property and liberties of the people of this land in regard to liquor, and we were told that the drinking of beer was part of the common law of England. That is a great addition to the law which was made by the noble Earl, Lord Halsbury, and I have no doubt will be chronicled with his judgments. But this cry about Commissions is an old cry. We have heard it before. Anybody who knows anything of the political history of this country remembers the cry that was raised against the India Bill of Mr. Fox. Why was that cry raised? Why was it that Bill was side-tracked in your Lordships' House? It was very largely because of the cry raised against the Commissioners. It was said the whole of the property and liberties and rights of the people of India, and everybody in England who was interested in India, would be placed at the disposal of three Commissioners, appointed by a Liberal Government, and so great was the indignation raised against that proposal that the Bill, as we all know, was got rid of in your Lordships' House, and one of the greatest political changes took place that this country has ever known, because it altered the course of events in this country for fifty years.

What happened in that case? A short time after the Commission had been got rid of, the Board of Control was invented, but wicked people who examined the powers and duties of that Board, which nobody in particular objected to, very soon saw that it was in reality only the old Commission dressed up again, and that the powers did not differ in any material particular. The old cry had done its duty and was forgotten. The same cry was raised in your Lordships' House against the Poor Law Commission. That Commission was one of the most powerful bodies ever invented by law, and when the measure setting it up came to your Lordships' House after a great and prolonged struggle in the House of Commons, attempts were made to get rid of it here by precisely the same arguments as those which fell from Lord Halsbury, and I believe it is the undoubted fact that if the Liberal Government of the time had not received the support of the great Duke of Wellington, that Commission would probably never have struggled into being. Therefore, I brush aside as entirely irrelevant all this alarm which is attempted to be raised in regard to the Commission

Lord Fitzmaurice.

We are also told—and this is, I think, the most extraordinary thing that has been said in this debate—that we have not got the full weight of evidence in support of our proposal for the limitation of licences. Why, my Lords, that was the one thing on which the Majority and Minority Reports of Lord Peel's Commission agreed. The Commission disagreed upon a great number of things, but they were practically unanimous on this, that the increase of temptation to drink was the cause of increased drunkenness. Those interested in social questions, in whatever capacity, have long since come to that conclusion, and Judges and chairmen of Quarter Sessions have over and over again, in charges to Grand Juries, expressed the same opinion. When, as a young man, I was one of the managers of an industrial school in London, with which I am still connected, I remember noticing the haggard appearance of some children who had recently been admitted, and the doctor said to me: "What can you expect of children brought up upon a regime of gin and sprats?" I have never forgotten the expression. They were children of the very poorest class, who had spent the whole of their lives in quarters of London amongst a class of whose existence I daresay some persons are hardly aware. I know myself that though I did believe at one time that I had seen some of the shums in London, I never realised the terrible effect of drink among the poorest classes of London until I was taken through some of the East End shums by a Cambridge friend who had taken up a curacy in that part. It is those places that you must visit if you want to see the effect of the drink traffic in full horror. Right rev. Prelates have worked among the crowded populations of our great towns and know that the evil is the heart of the evil; but from some of the speeches made during the debate it is evident that among many leading men there is, not perhaps unnaturally, a great want of appreciation of what the drink traffic and the drink problem really is.

I listened with great interest to what fell from noble Lords opposite in regard to the question of vested interests. We were reminded of the extreme care with which Parliament had treated those officers of the Army who were deprived of advantages by the passing of Lord Cardwell's Act, advantages they had purchased and for which they had paid lawful prices and also further prices not recognised under the law. It is perfectly true—nobody has disputed it—that they were compensated, but there was a great deal of controversy over the surplus price, and I do not feel at all certain in more recent circumstances that Parliament would allow itself to be so easily persuaded to make the payments that were then sanctioned. I remember a speech by Sir George Grey in opposition to the payment. Sir George Grey had as unrivalled an authority on home affairs as his successor Sir Edward Grey now has on foreign affairs; and it is well known that he did the whole of the home work in Lord Palmerston's Cabinet. Sir George Grey made a speech against giving the surplus price to those officers. We have been reminded also of Mr. Gladstone's action in regard to the Ulster custom of tenant right. I venture to say that in recognising the interest of licence-holders the Government are following those precedents, and upon those precedents we defend ourselves against the demand of extreme critics on our own side—that licence-holders should be treated as having a merely annual, or ephemeral, interest.

I at one moment thought of addressing myself to the very able arguments, if I may be allowed to say so, that were addressed to the House by the noble Viscount, Lord St. Aldwyn, in regard to the compensation clauses in the Bill. By the compensation clauses I mean, not merely the actual sum which any individual licence-holder may receive, but the whole of that subject which falls under the head of the basis of compensation, the distribution of compensation, the period of time—which, as Lord Rosebery pointed out, is really the root of the matter—and the question as to what is to happen with monopoly value both during the compensation period and after. But the clear and lucid statement which your Lordships have heard this afternoon from the noble Earl, Lord

Lytton, has made this to a great extent unnecessary, and I certainly shall not attempt to take up your time or spoil the noble Earl's arguments by repeating them. The noble Earl went over the ground with perfect knowledge of the facts and the law, and he has stated our case as well as we could possibly have desired it to be stated. Therefore I will not add anything to that part of the case.

But when we are told that we are introducing a new principle in regard to compensation by excluding brewers' profits, and thereby practically reversing the Kennedy judgment, I would venture to remind the noble and learned Earl, Lord Halsbury, of what was said by leading members of the late Government in discussions of the Act of 1904. The Home Secretary said—

"Compensation was given in respect of on-licences, not on the loss of business profits but on depreciation of the premises arising from the fact that the extinction of the licence prevented the house from being used for the purpose for which it was most adapted."

The Solicitor-General said—

"What was estimated was the depreciation of the property, and that was the whole basis and foundation of the Bill. It was said that the bulk of the compensation would go to the owners, who in many cases were brewers. He totally and absolutely denied it."

One of the greatest authorities in the House of Commons at that time on the law of licensing, Mr. (now Sir) Charles Cripps, said exactly the same thing, and he is a very independent supporter of the Government, as we all know from the events of the last few days. My blood was curdled yesterday by a placard which I saw, and by the offer to me of a newspaper which the news-vendor alleged contained the news of the resignation of the Government. I had not heard of the resignation myself and I bought a paper, to find that it was not the resignation of the Government nor of an individual member of the Government, but the resignation of the Vicar-General of the Province of Canterbury. I found that Sir Charles Cripps had resigned, not in consequence of the Licensing Bill, but in consequence of the Education Bill, thereby showing that on occasion he is quite able to assert his independence of his political friends. But with regard to this Bill, he came forward and gave the support of his known authority on licensing to the Government. I cite him now as an independent witness. How can it be said, whatever may be the rights and wrongs of the question, that we are departing from the intention of Parliament when we are proceeding on the lines of the Act of 1904?

I am willing, however, to grant that this is a topic upon which reasonable men may differ, and agree to differ; it is mixed with questions of rating and valuation, and surely the proper course is to settle such matters in Committee and not in a Second Reading debate. Let me remind your Lordships of what fell from the noble Viscount, Lord St. Aldwyn. He said he would have preferred a market value basis, and he gave four heads under which value might be computed. Among those he mentioned a sum to represent what may be called the goodwill for which, he said, the brewer was entitled to some compensation, less than the Kennedy judgment gave him, more than the Bill proposes to give him. Such points are matters of detail and proper for consideration in Committee. The noble Viscount, proceeding with his indictment, said it was a monstrous thing that at the end of the period of twenty-one years, or whatever the period may be, the publican who had paid into the compensation fund should be treated as the holder of a new on-licence and run the risk of losing his licence altogether, or, at all events, if he got it, of having to pay the monopoly value, subject again to the risks of local option and the caprice of the magistrates. But can it be worth while to throw out this Bill on Second Reading merely because you think that an injustice may be done by one of the clauses twenty-one years hence? That is contrary to the rule of common sense and to every custom of debate.

It is said that the Government will not listen to Amendments. We have never said anything of the kind. No Government in its senses, and especially a Government in a minority in your Lordships' House, would say they would not listen to Amendments. What we want to see are the Amendments placed on the Paper. We all speak with the highest respect of the noble Viscount, Lord St. Aldwyn, a man of immense experience not only in Imperial but in all local affairs concerned with rating, valuation, and assessment. There is absolutely nobody, by universal consent, in either House of Parliament more able to frame Amendments and to explain them; and I am quite certain I can say for the Government that we had hoped, from the tone of most of the speech of the noble Viscount, that he was going to support us on the Second Reading, reserving to himself full liberty to put down and press Amendments touching the points of the measure with which he did not agree. But, unfortunately, the noble Viscount took up a different position at the conclusion of his speech, and he will be found in the great and serried ranks which are about to give the Bill its death blow in the lobbies.

Even at the eleventh hour I would ask: Are we to lose this great opportunity? Do noble Lords opposite really think that this debate will not be read, marked, learnt, and inwardly digested throughout the whole country? Do they think that no effect will be produced upon the mind of the ordinary British citizen when he finds that an independent Peer who has been Prime Minister of this country, the noble Earl who sits on the cross benches; when he finds that the most rev. Primate, the natural mouthpiece of the Church of which noble Lords opposite are, I fancy, stronger supporters than many of us on this side; when he finds that a noble Lord of such great administrative experiences as Lord Balfour—when he finds that these noble Lords record their vote with us and that other independent Peers leave the House? I do not believe that the ordinary Unionist voter who recognises Mr. Balfour as his Leader has any desire to see this country governed by a revival of something very like the old Tory Party which governed, or rather misgoverned, this country for fifteen years after the Battle of Waterloo. The party opposite is rapidly shedding, one by one, all those independent elements which gave it force. Tariff reform has taken many away. The benches opposite are full of independent Peers who no longer habitually support the front bench; and it appears to me that the front bench are gradually resolving themselves into something like the old Tory Guard, and that their real Leader is the noble and learned Earl who until recently sat upon the Woolsack. Yes, my Lords, we are celebrating a funeral. The motto of this debate, as I have said, was struck in its opening speeches—

“I come to bury Cæsar, not to praise him.”

But may I remind your Lordships that in the same speech from which that familiar quotation is taken there is another line equally famous—

Yes:—I fear, my Lords, that when the result of these events comes to be written by the future historian the vote of to-night, killing this great measure of licensing and temperance reform, will not be accounted to your Lordships' House for righteousness.

THE EARL OF MEATH: My Lords, so many years of my life have been spent in combating the evils of intemperance that it is with the greatest regret that I find myself unable to give my vote in favour of this Bill. And why? Not that I am not alive, deeply alive, to all the evils, social and national, which are brought upon this country by intemperance. I am as well aware as the noble Lord who has just spoken of the terrible results of drink, but, at the same time, I cannot in my conscience say that this is a Bill which only considers the question of temperance.

There is, to my mind, no small amount of injustice in this Bill, and I for one will never allow my vote to be given for good in one direction if it brings evils in another. Already in this debate a famous saying by Archbishop Magee has been quoted. I am not going to repeat it, but will paraphrase it. If I were asked whether I would wish this country to be either sober or honest I would certainly reply, without hesitation, that I would rather see it honest. The difference between us is not, as the noble Lord has put it, that on the one side we wish to uphold and support a certain trade, and that on the other it is desired to get rid of intemperance. We both desire to get rid of intemperance; it is only a question of method. We wish that temperance should be advanced and that justice should be done, but we are not—at least

I am not—going to separate the one from the other. Is this a just and well-considered measure? If it could be proved to be such I should be the first to give it my most earnest support, but I cannot honestly say that it is. Its glaring faults have already been eloquently described, faults of omission as well as of commission. I do not profess to possess an abnormal sense of justice or of virtue, but I cannot subordinate the sense I have. I believe honestly that this is not a just and honest Bill. I give full credit to those who recognise merits in the Bill—I myself recognise many—but I deny that it covers the whole ground of temperance, and I certainly do not consider that it is a Bill which should be passed at this day. We who oppose the Bill have been asked why we do not pass the Second Reading, go into Committee, and move Amendments. That we would be willing to do if we saw the smallest chance of our Amendments being accepted. It is well known that most of those Amendments would be of a financial character, and if we had once passed the Second Reading we should be in the position of having approved the principle of the Bill, and then of having our Amendments flung in our faces because, forsooth, it would be said that they touched the privileges of the House of Commons. The choice, therefore, is a Hobson's choice. We have no chance whatever of passing Amendments. Therefore we can only reject the Bill in the hope that at some future date we shall have a Bill which will not offend our consciences.

Although I am afraid this Bill will be rejected, is it not possible for the two parties to come together, as they have on the Education Bill, and come to some compromise? There are large numbers of us who believe that there are many points in this Bill which would meet the views of all moderate men, and I hope that something of that sort will be done. I am glad to observe that Lord Monkswell has done his best to try and save some portion of the wreckage of this Bill by proposing that Clause 21, dealing with the exclusion of children from bars of licensed houses, should be incorporated in the Children Bill, which comes before your Lordships on Monday. Personally I should be very glad if some other portions of the

The Earl of Meath.

Bill could in the same way be incorporated in another measure. In my opinion the spirit of political vindictiveness is so apparent in this Bill that your Lordships will be amply justified in throwing it out on Second Reading, even though it should come in the specious guise of a professing intention of considering the noble and great question of temperance.

EARL CAWDOR: My Lords, no one can rise to address your Lordships on this most important question without feeling strongly the wish that we were discussing a measure of temperance to which we could all give our adhesion and our vote. None of us can but feel the great evils of the drink problem and its great difficulties, and we note, and note with sympathy, how strongly those who know most of the evils of this traffic speak of it in your Lordships' House. No one can realise as well as those who live in every day communication with the working classes in the largest of our towns, how great that evil is.

I was a little sorry that my noble friend who spoke last from the front Ministerial bench should have thought it incumbent upon him to try and lay down that we upon this side of the House had not as closely at heart the true interests of the temperance question as noble Lords opposite. I decline to hold any opinion of that kind. Both sides of the House are, I am convinced, animated with the same wish. We only differ, though we differ strongly, as to the remedy which should be applied to the disease. The noble Lord the Chancellor of the Duchy dethroned my noble leader and put in his place the noble and learned Earl who until recently sat upon the Woolsack. I was not aware that the leadership of our party had been so changed. I have always recognised, and I think I recognise still, as one of the most loyal followers and colleagues of the noble Marquess, the late Lord Chancellor. But we do not mind the noble Lord amusing himself with a little banter at our expense. When we consider this great question we cannot avoid feeling that there are two aspects in which it is regarded. I think that was pointed to, to some extent, by the right rev. Prelate the Bishop of Southwark. The right rev. Prelate referred to two ways in which these matters were considered—one, I think he said, was more the aspect of sentiment and the other more the aspect of reason. I have the greatest sympathy with the sentiments which guide most people with regard to this great question, but I think we must guard ourselves strongly against one thing. Let our hearts beat in sympathy with all these troubles, but our heads must not be dominated and over-ruled by our hearts.

We are often told, as we were to-night by the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Duchy, that we on this side have not at heart the interests of true licensing reform. Does the noble Lord quite forget the Act of 1902, an Act of which hardly anything has been said in the debates on this subject? That Act dealt, I think almost for the first time, if not absolutely for the first time, with the ordinary drunkard. It was the first time that Parliament provided for the apprehension of a man for being drunk when the drinking was unaccompanied by violence. That was a step in advance in dealing with the drunkard. The Act of 1902 also dealt with the record of convictions of drunken persons, and gave control to the justices over the structures of licensed premises. There has been some criticism as to those powers not being sufficient, but that was the first time that these powers were given to justices at all. We had, further, in that same Act the registration of clubs.

Then let me pass from the Act of 1902 to the Act of 1904. In that Act we provided for a reduction of licences, and for the levy upon licence-holders for compensation in respect of licences that were abolished. It is really difficult, looking to these two Acts and to the points which they touch, in certain cases for the first time, to say that the authors of them and those who supported them, were not in sympathy with true temperance reform. The noble Earl, L. Lytton, in the course of his interest and able speech this afternoon, criticised a good deal the Act of 1904. I do propose to follow him at length into criticisms. I think the noble Earl was hardly fair to that Act, for he seemed to put upon it all the deficiencies of the licensing system up to the present time. That Act may have its faults and shortcomings, but it certainly made a large stride in the direction in which licensing reform appears to be tending to-day. I do not propose to go closely into the actual figures of reduction, but I think I am entitled to claim that, in the matter of reduction, the Act made a considerable advance upon what was the case before, and this reduction has been carried out by the local authorities, with knowledge of the districts over which they had control, at the cost of the trade and to the injury of nobody. Fault has been found, of course, that the Act is not going fast enough. There seems to be a great hurry in legislative matters just now. Surely you had better leave an Act which is working fairly well to work a little longer before you absolutely condemn it for not going fast enough. There would be no difficulty in quickening its steps hereafter if it is really found to be going too slow.

I wish to say a word or two with regard to the allegation of slowness in the working of this Act. The right rev. Prelate the Bishop of London, in the eloquent speech which he made in this debate, stated that under the Act of 1904 30,000 licences could not, in his opinion, possibly be extinguished in under 100 years. An answer to that statement is to be found in what has been done in the county of Lancashire. In that county the licensing committee took this question up in 1905, and went to great trouble to ascertain what the reasonable requirements of the various districts were and the total number of licences which might ultimately be reduced. They held a personal inspection of the county accompanied by the police, and, after going into the whole question with great carefulness, they gave it as their opinion that out of 4,080 licences 763 should be reduced. Reduction has been going on up to the present time,

I now turn to this Bill. After the many able speeches to which your Lordships have listened I am not going to detain you by going through the whole of the Bill. I think we may take as its foundation the time-limit, and bound up with the time-limit is what we consider inadequate compensation. This compensation is to be paid by a levy, and those who pay the levy are, instead of gaining some advantage in the future for paying it, to pay it and get no advantage from the payment whatever. Then, my Lords, after the time-limit we find the existing licence holder placed in exactly the same position as the new applicant. You are going to tax the existing licence-holder on the assumption, I presume, that he is paying for a something of value. But that something you propose to make worthless; you put him in competition with the new applicant who comes with capital at his command, with no capital invested in the trade, and absolutely free to accept the terms or to walk away unharmed. I can conceive nothing more unjust than that.

Then behind all this, local option looms up in the future. If local option is such an excellent thing, why do not His Majesty's Government tackle it and make use of it at once? They let it slide. They propose to inflict upon a generation twenty or twenty-one years hence the local option which they do not wish to have to-day. I should have thought the generation to come might have taken care of itself, and been allowed to say whether or not it would have local option. The main idea of this Bill appears to be that there is to be a great quickening in the reduction of licensed houses. How is that to be brought about? It is to be brought about, first of all, by setting aside the local authority and putting in its place a Commission with no local knowledge of any sort or kind, and it is to be pushed ahead by a rigid rule laid down in a Schedule as to the reductions that are to take place. I shall be told that is not absolutely correct. I admit that, so far as the Schedule of reductions is concerned, there is a discretion in the Bill. But it is impossible to suppose that any very great stress is to be laid upon the discretion in the note to the Schedule, and for this reason—if you once begin to tamper to any extent with the rules laid down in the Schedule you will absolutely destroy the Schedule altogether. I am afraid the calculations have not been sufficiently carefully made, or His Majesty's Government would have found that the computation in the Second Schedule is not at all accurate or at all a possible calculation upon which you can work. I repeat that if you begin to tamper with your Schedule according to your footnote you absolutely destroy your Schedule and you must start afresh; and it is quite clear that His Majesty's Government had no intention of having it tampered with, because in another place, during the discussions of Clause 1 in Committee, Amendments were rejected, at the instance of the Government, which proposed to enable the justices to adjust on-licences in proportion to the population. There is, therefore, no intention of giving a wide discretion to get away from the Schedule.

I pass from the consideration of how the reduction is to be quickened by machinery to consider how it is to be quickened by cash; and here you are going to get the same amount of money under the levy—perhaps more—and you are going to give less compensation to the unfortunate owners of licensed houses, because you are going to compensate them on the basis of assessment under Schedule A instead of taking the market value of their trade. Therefore you are going to get your quickening at the cost, not of the public, but of the trade. We have heard a great deal of a high-sounding phrase, and the noble Earl who introduced this Bill quoted it himself. The noble Earl called our attention to the phrase in the Report of the Royal Commission that—

“There is hardly any sacrifice too great which would result in a marked diminution of the national degradation.”

Many of us feel that there might be very great sacrifices indeed if we could be satisfied that those sacrifices and the legislation embodying them would bring about a great diminution of the drink curse of the country. But in the speeches that we have had in this House during the last few days there has been nothing whatever to show that what is proposed in this Bill would bring that diminution about.

Earl Cawdor

Speaker after speaker, and those particularly who are strong advocates of the Bill, have been bound to admit that there is no real proof on which they can say that reduction of houses according to population has in the past or is sure in the future to bring about a reduction of drunkenness. In this Bill there is sacrifice, but it does not fall upon the public, who are supposed to wish the reduction to take place, and it does not fall upon the State, which says the sacrifice cannot be too great. The burden is placed on one class alone. The right rev. Prelate the Bishop of London described the state of some of the slums and how disheartening it was to see what was going on night after night in the public-houses in them. He spoke of public-houses as being "crammed with a mass of struggling humanity." That must be a most painful scene, and represents a great evil, not only by showing that these people will and must have drink, but as showing that the places where they get their drink now are in some cases so overcrowded that it is almost impossible properly to control them, whether by the police or by those in charge of the house.

THE LORD BISHOP OF LONDON: I was referring specially to a Sunday afternoon. I did not mean that it was always so.

EARL CAWDOR: I was not quite clear whether the right rev. Prelate meant every day, but I would ask whether we can hope that by closing public-houses in that district we are going to cure that evil. By diminishing accommodation you will increase the struggling mass. People who will struggle for drink in that uncomfortable way will get it elsewhere—perhaps free from supervision, and possibly by taking to drinking spirits in their own houses. I press this matter because I feel most strongly that there is much to be said as between licensed houses and clubs—I mean clubs set up for the purposes of drinking, of which, as we know, there are very many. In many parts they are a great and growing evil.

I want, if I may, to refer to two matters which I think bear upon this. I ask your Lordships to note the result of an experiment in India. Thirty years ago there was in the Army there the close canteen system. The soldiers were given two pints of beer and no more. What was the result? The result of the close canteen system was the drinking of arrack and other poisonous spirits, leading to a large amount of drunkenness. In 1874 a battery of artillery went out to India and an experiment was then tried. Instead of continuing the close canteen, the open canteen was tried, the men being allowed to get what they chose to buy. The result was that in a very short time drunkenness in that battery practically disappeared. The drinking of arrack ceased, and from that day to this the system of the open canteen has been extended all over the British Army. This experiment shows that restrictive measures often work exactly in the opposite direction from that in which they were expected to tend. When, also, I think in the time of the noble and gallant Field-Marshal (Lord Roberts), institutes for soldiers were started in India, they were, if not absolutely attached to the canteen, an addition to it. Instead of the canteen being made the principal attraction for the soldier, the institute alongside became the main attraction. The result has been a most happy one, for the institutes have tended to the diminution of the drinking habit among soldiers, while leading them to take up intellectual and other pursuits.

I would also refer to what was said by my noble friend Lord Halifax last night with regard to this particular point. It was, I think, the shortest speech in the whole of this debate, and I am sure it was not very far off being the best. The noble Viscount stated that in a colliery village he knew in Yorkshire, a man familiar with the habits of the miners and noted for his splendid philanthropic work was striving to get a public-house with its comforts established in the village, because the clubs were getting an absolute hold of the men. Reformers must not, therefore, rely too much on wiping out the public-house, which, after all, may have its uses in our social economy. I would point out also to the Bishop of London that the rejection of this Bill would not alter the present position of the licence-holder by giving him, as the right rev. Prelate feared, a freehold in the licence. Parliament will be left free to deal with the licence in future, and instead of the trade being placed in an impregnable position the outlook will have become really more clear.

We are often told that we might have amended the Bill. What is it that noble Lords opposite expected us to amend? What would the noble Earl the Leader of the House accept? Noble Lords want to see our Amendments. I think they have been clearly told that there are some grave points which, if unamended, would compel us to throw out the Bill even on the Third Reading stage. No sign has been given by the Government whether or not they would take up and consider any Amendments. We object to the Bill because of its main provisions, because of its time-limit and compensation clauses. There are, however, many points of real licensing reform which we would gladly try to pass if there was the slightest hope of assistance from the Government. I recognise the value of the children clause and the Sunday trading clause, but I am unable to understand how such ardent reformers of the drink traffic as the Government have failed to deal with the grocers' licences in this Bill. I do not think I am doing him an injustice when I say that the noble Earl the Leader of the House brushed aside the question of grocers' licences as not bearing to any perceptible extent on drunkenness.

*THE LORD PRIVY SEAL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of CREWE): I think what I said was that the case against grocers' licences was not proven.

EARL CAWDOR: Yes; but if not proven the case might be dealt with very much in the same way as the Government are now dealing with other cases that are not proven. Noble Lords opposite are always sheltering themselves behind the opinion of experts, behind those who have lived among the people and who have studied this question. The Bishops of London and Bristol have told the House that the greatest evil to be contended against now is the drunkenness caused by the grocers' licences. Then there is the provision as to clubs. If the Government are going to change so drastically the position of the licensed house, it is absolutely necessary to legislate further for clubs in order to get rid of the grave discrepancies that exist between the public-houses and them.

Lastly, I hope we may be able to come to some agreement as to the valuable Bill of Lord Lamington. A strong desire prevails that something should be done in the direction indicated by that measure to remove the restrictions which hamper the improvement of the public-house. Your Lordships will remember the speech of the Bishop of Birmingham. He told us that he had been in the habit of sitting for a number of hours in German public-houses. He found them very pleasant places, and expressed a wish that it might be possible to have something of the kind in this country. In the dim and not distant future may we hope that some of us may live to see the right rev. Prelate and his brethren on the episcopal bench, perchance not in their robes but distinguished by those garments by which they are so easily recognised, sitting together with their wives and families at the stone tables which we know so well, taking whatever refreshments may seem good to them—not in Germany, but in London, and without a whisper of condemnation from Church people at home. But I have my doubts whether this Bill is going to help forward that happy realisation. Still, if we could arrive at agreement on Lord Lamington's Bill we might yet hope to see that charming picture in the flesh.

May I say a few words as to the remarkable speech we heard last night from the noble Earl on the cross benches! Lord Rosebery is quoted by the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Duchy as the great independent authority whose speech of last night is going to show the country how right the Government are and how wrong is the action of my noble friend and ourselves on this side. Lord Rosebery said he was absolutely in favour of the Bill, and that he had no shadow of doubt about voting for it. He then proceeded to discuss it rather fully. He said—

"I have not the slightest doubt as to my vote, not for all the details of the Bill but certainly for the fundamental principle that underlies the Bill."

He went on to say that the time-limit was the fundamental principle that underlies the Bill. That may be and probably is so, but linked up with the time-limit is surely the question of compensation. A time-limit would not be wanted unless you were coming at some time to the end of it, at which date your compensation is to stop. Therefore if you take the time-limit as a fundamental principle of the Bill, I venture to say you must interweave also the compensation clauses which are bound together with it.

Let us see what followed in the noble Earl's speech. He acknowledged that interests had been built up with the permission of the State, and he went on to say that logically, that being so, the State should pay the compensation. He said—

"The State having allowed this state of things to grow up, in strict logic it should pay the compensation or most of the compensation. It has allowed and tolerated this understanding it has almost encouraged it, and why should the burden be laid on others which is due only to that amorphous being that is called the State."

"But that is outside the region of practical politics. In the first place, the State could not afford it."

What does that mean? You have an admission that there is an interest entitled to compensation, a statement that the State is responsible for that interest and the right to compensation, and there is set up against it this extraordinary tenet, that that is outside of practical politics because "the State cannot afford it." Is it possible that the justification of that is that the State does not wish to pay what it thinks necessary, and therefore will not face the obligation—that the obligation has to be faced not by the State, but by the victims of the legislation you are trying to pass? Could there be a stronger condemnation of this measure than that?

The noble Earl went on to use very remarkable words, particularly for one who has had his experience. He talked of the trade poisoning the sources of our political and municipal life. That is a strongish phrase of itself, but the noble Earl went on to elaborate it and everyone is aware how much the noble Earl knows of political and municipal life. He proceeded to say—I am quoting from The Times—

"No one can have been engaged in municipal life for any time or almost in any community without seeing that the candidates are chosen, not with reference to their purity, but entirely in deference to their subserviency to the trade."

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: I do not wish to interrupt the noble Earl. He should omit the article. I said "candidates are chosen" not "the candidates are chosen."

EARL CAWDOR: I do not see the difference.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: The difference is between universal and occasional.

EARL CAWDOR: I contend that that is a sweeping and unwarrantable charge. I agree that you may destroy the value of the interest in question by legislation, but, if you do, you will be doing an injustice absolutely unworthy of the State. We have been told by several noble Lords who sit, some of them on this side and some on the other, that we are doing a very bad service—I think the actual word used is that we are doing a disservice—to property generally by linking it up with this particular trade. I think that may be put too high. We admit that this property or this interest is, in certain ways, on a different footing from other property. But I am not afraid to mix up this particular property with property generally. It is said that this is a less important property than freehold, but if you deal in an unjust way with this kind of property the precedent may very easily spread to more valuable property of every sort and kind throughout the country. Therefore, we are doing no disservice to other kinds of property in standing up for the rights of smaller people when their rights are unjustly and inequitably attacked.

Threats are often hurled at your Lordships' House. That is nothing new to us.

We are accustomed to autumn campaigns, and I do not know that we are very much the worse for them. I sometimes think we are rather the better. But strong language has been used recently by one of His Majesty's Ministers. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, speaking at Bristol a short time ago, used language which in ordinary life one would call distinctly aggressive. I would venture to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that instead of flourishing the banner of threat against the House of Lords, it would be far better in the interests of the country if he would retire to Ireland and exercise his authority there on those who very much need it. Common sense and common honesty condemn this Bill; and because the Bill is unjust, and therefore wrong, I trust your Lordships will not accord to it a Second Reading.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord LOREBURN): My Lords, I think it will be in accordance with your Lordships' natural inclinations if I should not at this time of the day take any very long time in replying on behalf of His Majesty's Government. My first instinct when I learnt that the death-blow had been administered to this Bill at Lansdowne House was that there must be complete unreality in everything that took place in the three days that the Bill was to be discussed on Second Reading. But on reflection I thought, and experience has confirmed it, that many speeches of very great interest would be delivered, although the discussion is purely academic, for the decision is foreseen and foreknown.

There have been two classes of question raised—one not very much adverted to, but naturally raised, on which I shall say only a word, and that is the constitutional aspect of the proceedings which have taken place. My Lords, I venture to say that since the Reform Bill of 1832, your Lordships' House has seldom thrown out upon Second Reading any Bill of first-rate importance which has come recommended by a considerable majority in the House of Commons. The Home Rule Bill was supported by a very small majority in the other House, but I do not recollect any other Bill of first-rate importance since 1832 which was so treated. Unless my memory is at fault, the resistance of the House of Lords to the Reform Bill of 1832 itself was not by throwing out the Bill on Second Reading, but was after taking and amending it.

Here is a Bill which comes from the House of Commons by a majority of 200 or 300, supported by practically all of those who are sent up especially to represent labour—that is to say, those classes by whom public-houses are most used. It comes after protracted sittings between February and November during the whole year, and this House will not entertain it on Second Reading. I think that is a very bad precedent, and I think it is inconsistent with the course that your Lordships' House has pursued ever since the Reform Bill of 1832. But, after all, that constitutional point is one from which I pass, for it is one of minor importance.

I come to the merits of the Bill. It is a measure of enormous magnitude and complexity. Every kind of objection upon detail has been invoked against a Second Reading. It is impossible for me to correct the many, many misapprehensions that have been expressed. It cannot be done. Noble Lords have no doubt perfectly honestly endeavoured to follow it, and I admit it is a difficult subject; but I assure your Lordships that there are many points which you have thoroughly misunderstood or been misinformed about in regard to the scope of the Bill. I am not saying that by way of appeal. I am perfectly aware that the Bill is as dead as a door-nail.

But will your Lordships allow me very shortly to present, not particular details, but a general view of what the Government meant and mean by the Bill? It seems to me the only way to counteract the misapprehensions that exist. In the first place, why did we bring in the Bill at all? I do not believe I am a fanatic. I am not aware that I am prepossessed that way. I do not regard any canon against drinking as a necessary eleventh Commandment. I have no ambition to add to the Decalogue in that respect. But I am a man of business, a man of the world, I hope, and I can see the evils that are going on around us, and the dangerous and frightful consequences to this country in all their aspects arising from the mischief of drink. I see also that there is a direct conflict in some respects between the interests of this trade and the interests of the State. I have no intention of making any attack upon the trade, but their interest is that people should drink. Short of drunkenness, the more people drink the better for the trade. The interest of the State, on the other hand, is that the consumption of liquor should be greatly restricted.

Consider what the actual state of things is. The drink bill is £166,000,000. Ten per cent. of that would more than pay for half the cost of our Navy. Compare it with Canada. We drink four times as much as Canada. I make allowances for the difference of the climate, though that is not wholly favourable to us, and the difference in social circumstances. If we drank, not quarter, but a half of what we do, the people of this country would be better off by £83,000,000. There are very few families in this country, I suppose very few in this House, in which either members of the family themselves, or servants, or dependants have not been victims of this frightful curse and been the cause of infinite misery in the circles in which they live. We all know that, though it does not appear in any record or statistics.

But if you come to statistics, to the microscopic examination which has been made of the social fabric during the last twenty years, into every branch of it, the results are appalling. With regard to prisons, the Bishop of London told us that 93 per cent. of the inmates were there in consequence of drink. I spoke to a Judge of Assize not long ago, not of my way of thinking in politics, so far as Judges, except the Lord Chancellor, are permitted to have political opinions, and I asked him how many of the cases that came before him at the last assize were due to drink. He said eleven out of twelve directly, and the twelfth indirectly. In the case of disease, any doctor will tell your Lordships of the mischief which they see arise in their circle of patients. In lunacy, according to the last Report of the Lunacy Commission, 22 per cent. of the men confined in lunatic asylums were there directly by reason of drink, to say nothing of the multitudes who owe their lunacy to hereditary disease caused

The Manchester investigation showed that 51 per cent. of the workhouse inmates were there in consequence of drink. The Report of the Royal Commission on Housing shows that bad housing and drink act and re-act so much on one another that it is impossible to tell which is the cause and which is the effect. The best opinion in regard to cases of cruelty to children is that anything up to 90 per cent. of the cases of cruelty are due to drink.

In regard to physical deterioration, your Lordships may have read the reports on that subject, and there you will have found drink described as a potent and deadly agent. Lastly, the noble Marquess referred to the influence of drink upon unemployment which we cannot possibly fathom, but of which you will find this, that although there are many fine fellows lamentably situated, deserving work but unable to get it, one of the difficulties in providing for them is that there is also a number of unemployable people, unemployable because of drink, whose condition and number interfere with giving proper employment to the others. It has been for years my habit to read all I can find of reports on social subjects, and I have formed this opinion, that if only this mischief could be dealt with effectually, whether by one party or the other, I care not which, 75 per cent. of the social evils in this country would settle themselves. What strikes me with astonishment and regret is this, that in this House, where I know, and we all know, there are many men who give large sums and spend much labour and time and thought in rescuing people who have come to trouble by reason of this frightful vice, they seem not to see the necessity, and, if I may respectfully say so, the common-sense of trying to stop these people by any means they can before they fall over the precipice. It is astonishing to me that when there are so many who are willing to do everything for such people, they should fail to see that good and wise laws of this kind will prevent people from falling. So much for the mischief.

These things show the extreme danger of this trade with which we are dealing, and our forefathers have always recog-were granted that it is absolutely necessary to control this trade, to watch it, and not to allow it to obtain an insidious influence in any direction. The Amendment of the noble Marquess admits the necessity and propriety of dealing with this evil of intemperance. The framer of the Amendment seems to think that the Bill will not materially improve the state of things which exists. Is that so? In the first place, let me say what has come out in this debate. Of many of the minor portions of the Bill there has been a chorus of approbation from all quarters of the House. Particular reference has been made to Sunday closing so far as it goes in the Bill—I believe only thirty-nine Members of the House of Commons were found to vote against it. So far as I can make out, there would not be any Members of this House who would oppose it. Statutory conditions are also proposed to give control over the arrangement of premises and access to them, and to deal with the later opening of houses in the morning. There are provisions to forbid children from being admitted to bars, for closing houses on election days, and for preventing beer being hawked in vans all over the country. No one is otherwise than favourable to all these provisions; indeed, everyone approves of them.

Then there are the provisions as to clubs. Everyone approves of them so far as they go. In my opinion clubs are a very dangerous element, especially when you are going to suppress public-houses, and this Bill proposes to extend the time before which no house closed as a public-house shall be opened as a club; and it will effectually prevent the control by brewers of clubs. But some of your Lordships think that these clubs clauses should be made stronger. Well, I hope my colleagues will forgive me for saying that I myself heartily wish they could be made stronger, and if that were done you would have no more willing supporter than myself. No one denies that these clauses so far as they go are good. It is the same with the off-licences. It may be, as some people think, that the provisions in regard to off-licences are not strong enough. Very well, why not make them stronger? The cumulative effect of these proposals will be very greatly in the direction of temperance, and that has not

What justification, then, is there for rejection of these clauses? There has been a reference to privilege. What is the position as between this House and the House of Commons in regard to matters of privilege? Your Lordships can protect yourselves perfectly against any abuse of privilege. Supposing this Bill had gone into Committee; supposing there were a great number of privileged clauses, which I am bound to say to my mind do not seem so numerous as they seem to be in the estimation of some noble Lords; and suppose your Lordships amended the clauses and returned them to the House of Commons and that the House of Commons then claimed privilege: that means simply that the House of Commons refuses to assent to your Amendments; you are still absolutely free to reject the Bill, to refuse to pass it into law. I cannot understand the argument when you have a Bill with a great deal of good in it and some features which you may consider bad, why in the name of common-sense you ought to reject the good, on the theory that you cannot separate the good from the bad, when in point of fact you can do one of two things; you can either insist on having only the good retained, or you can do what you are asked to do now—throw out the Bill. Of all the arguments ever put forward to justify a strange constitutional precedent, that of rejecting a Bill of this magnitude and with these antecedents in such a way is one of the strangest I ever heard, and I cannot help thinking that the prospect is not appreciated by noble Lords who adopt it.

So much for the good parts of the Bill: for people have become aware that there are good points in the Bill, and I wish this had been recognised earlier during weary sittings in the House of Commons when many of these things now said to be boons were regarded with very different feelings. Who will answer for the opinion of the House of Commons as to how they would treat these clauses if they were sent back to the House of Commons; who will answer for the time that will be spent—and, as your Lordships know, time is now the most precious Parliamentary possession that can be imagined?

Why, some day people will recognise that we are trying to do three or four times as much business in the House of Commons than can possibly be done. I speak with respect, with the utmost respect, for the House of Commons, where I sat twenty-six years, and they were among the happiest years of my life; but what is the position? This Bill was closed in that House, and I am glad to see, and I think it is very creditable to the good feeling of noble Lords, that that circumstance has hardly been alluded to. It was the same with the Bill of 1904; that Bill was closed, and I remember making a protest against it. We all do that, but I most bitterly regret the closing of this Bill. But the reign of closure has come to stay in the House of Commons until such time as both parties in the State will see that it is necessary to have some effective instrument in order to get rid of bad laws or to make good laws when they are needed.

I pass from that subject now and turn to other parts of the Bill. There is that part relating to reduction of licences; that is the portion which has been so strongly condemned. It is said to be hostile, predatory, and vindictive. Now will you allow me to examine the principle on which this reduction rests—not going into detail, not dealing with Committee points, but dealing only with principle? I will say nothing of the Kennedy judgment, which has been dealt with in the admirable speech of Lord Lytton. I think I could satisfy your Lordships that it was contrary to the expressed intention of the framers of the Act of 1904. I will not say anything about the length of the time-limit. I am not sanguine enough to suppose that in any length of time I could persuade your Lordships by statistical examination that the period of time in the Bill is fitting. I am not dealing with the amount of compensation or the time-limit; if ever there were things appropriate for Committee examination they are such as these.

I deal with the principle, and I will tell your Lordships what was the course of inducement to accept the Bill. The first pri-is necessary, to reduce the number of licences, that is the indispensable preliminary to reform in the liquor trade. Is that denied? The last speaker (Earl Cawdor) either denied it or threw cold water upon it. Lord St. Aldwyn said it is a principle which has been accepted by both parties. The noble Marquess (Lord Lansdowne) stated it is indispensable, but it is a principle which must be treated with discrimination. Well, yes; everything in this world must be treated with discrimination. The Bill of 1904 proceeded upon the same doctrine. I remember perfectly well the discussions on that Bill and the bitter resistance I offered to it, for I knew and foresaw exactly the kind of argument that would be based upon it, and I thought better leave the trade to make its own insurance against future liabilities. How was that Bill defended? It is true something was given to the trade, but look at the enormous and inestimable blessings to be derived from the reduction of licences. It is true, and no one has denied it, that the prospective reduction was the great thing put forward; are we to have it contradicted and denied now? It has not been denied by your Lordships. I know it has been said by Lord Robertson that you cannot establish a statistical and conclusive proof of it. Of course you cannot; if you can prove that by statistics, you can prove anything by statistics.

Everyone familiar with this subject, including noble Lords on the front Opposition bench, as well as bishops and members of the Government, knows perfectly well that you must reduce the number of public-houses for a variety of reasons. Because they offer temptations, because they escape control; because, as Lord Lytton pointed out, they make people drive the trade if there are many houses in competition, and competition makes a pushing trade, often an illegitimate trade. That is the first reason why we started with a reduction of licences as indispensable. Then it may be said: "Why such a reduction?" What was the reduction anticipated under the Act

1,096; the Kennedy judgment required too large compensation. What is the reduction contemplated under this Bill? 2,200, a less reduction than was contemplated by the framers of the 1904 Act. The next proposition is that the reduction shall be regulated by statute and at the cost of the trade; there is nothing new in this, it was in the Bill of 1904.

I will not enter at length into the quantum or quality of the property or interest created by licences; far be it from me to enter on such a subject now; it would be mere trifling with words; what took place is the important thing. Previous to 1904, a licence was annual and nothing more, and there was a right to take a licence away if there was redundancy. In 1904 it was provided there should be no withdrawal of the licence in case of good conduct without compensation. Attached to that was the liability of the trade to find the money for compensation. Hence there is no doubt that it was recognised that an interest was created by the licence of the State; but it existed only so long as a monopoly or restricted trade was permitted, which could be destroyed tomorrow by free trade in licences, and was of such a nature that all parties agreed that if it were taken away compensation must come from the pockets of fellow traders. Those are the facts we drew our conclusions from. It is an anomalous and exceptional kind of property, this property in a licence, and of an entirely different description from ordinary property.

I now come to the third principle which we thought was necessary; and that was that at some time—I do not enter upon the question of what time—it was in the imperative interest of the State that this exceptional and anomalous right of renewal should disappear, and that the State should resume the power to refuse the licence in the public interest, unfettered by the existence of any vested right of property at all. Is that a strong proposition? I understood Lord St. Aldwyn to indicate that the time should be nearer twenty-eight years than fourteen years. I did not understand the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition to say it would be wrong to resume it at any time. I therefore put this to your

Lord Loreburn.

Lordships in good faith: Are you prepared to lay down the rule that because an annual licence was treated as a property of that kind in the Act of 1904—contrary to the vehement opposition of some of us—the people of England are to be subjected to that burden for ever? Surely it cannot be that your Lordships would desire that the position created by the Act of 1904 should be in perpetuity a huge obstacle to every kind of experiment in temperance reform. If that is so, I hope we are not far from one another in this—that a time may come at some date, the sooner the better, I think, when the State shall be at liberty to resume the right which it had for 400 years, and which, if the counsels of wiser men had been adopted, it would still have had unqualified, to treat licences apart from any vested interest.

My fourth proposition is that this can only be done by exacting the monopoly value. Every statute that was passed from the commencement of our licensing history down to 1904—I do not refer to the ante-1869 licences—spoke in the most unequivocal terms of the annual licence as a licence for one year and no more. These three words “and no more” indicated the desire on the part of those who have gone before us to make it clear that the licensee had no right in the licence beyond one year. Nevertheless, a claim to a vested interest grew up; and the only way to prevent the renewal of another vested interest is to say, as the late Government said in the Act of 1904, that there should be a payment for monopoly value in the case of existing and in the case of new licences.

I now come to the last principle of all. We came to the conclusion that it was necessary to have a scheme for all England and not a scheme only for county by county. The reason for that is very obvious. There is a great disparity in the density of licences in different parts of the United Kingdom. In London, there are districts where there is a licence for every 1,500 or 2,000 of the population. There are some places again where the number of licences is a perfect scandal where there is one licence for every 150 or 160 adult inhabitants. If you do not have some system by which you would be able to pool all the receipts from the different levies all over the country and apply them so that the entire country shall have the benefit, you will never get rid of the worst cases of excessive licences, which are in the slums of our great cities. For that purpose, and that purpose alone, it is necessary to have a Commission to co-ordinate the schemes of suppression sent up to them by the local justices; to keep the whole of England in their hands for financial purposes; to see that the levy is sufficient to go round, and not for the purpose of dictating to the local justices what house shall or shall not be shut. It is said: What right have you to take from Devonshire money in order to spend it in London? But if it is lawful and honest, as it is at present under the Act of 1904, to take money raised by levy on the north coast of Devon and spend it in Plymouth on the south coast, why is it wicked to take it from Cornwall and spend it elsewhere? These canons of ethics are too subtle for me.

These are the principles contained in the Bill, stripped of the multiplicity of necessary detail, and I maintain that so far as these principles are concerned, every one of them has been supported by declarations of the leaders of the Conservative Party, and illustrated in the legislation which they themselves have passed. The fate of the Bill I know is decided. It is not altogether in the interest of the Government, believe me, that I object to the course which has been taken by the leader of the Opposition. I know very well that the subject is unpopular, and it may have influenced the recent bye-elections. But I think it is our duty to stand by the Bill, no matter how many bye-elections may have gone against us. No Government will lose in the long run by holding to what it believes to be honest and right. If you can show us that we are wrong why have you not gone into Committee and considered the details of the Bill, so that we may convince you, or be convinced by you? What right have you to suppose that we are desirous of acting dishonestly by any trade? We shall be overwhelmed of course. But with all respect to the noble Marquess who leads the Opposition, and I feel a real respect for him, I say it will not be to his honour, it will not be to his credit, that this Bill is rejected, for it is the triumph of a trade over the community, it is the victory of wrong over right.

On Question, "That the words proposed to be left out, stand part of the Question."

"Resolved, This House, while ready to consider favourably any Amendments which experience has shown to be necessary in the law regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, declines to proceed further with a measure which, without materially advancing the cause of temperance, would occasion grave inconvenience to many of His Majesty's subjects, and violate every principle of equity in its dealings with the numerous classes whose interests will be affected by the Bill."

House adjourned at twenty minutes past Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Division of Untenanted Land on Estate of Mrs. Shelton at Beaufort.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY (Limerick, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say when the grazing lettings on the estate of Mrs. Shelton at Beaufort will end; and when will the Estates Commissioners take over the place and divide the untenanted land on it.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners are not at present in a position to furnish the information asked for. The papers in connection with the estate are with their inspector with a view to the preparation of a scheme for the distribution of the lands. The Commissioners cannot take over possession until the scheme has been settled.

Delay in Reinstatement of Evicted Tenants at Lane Joynt Estate.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say what is the cause of delay in reinstating the evicted tenants on the estate of Lane Joynt at Aughanish, in the County of Limerick; and why will not the Estates Commissioners put into operation the compulsory provisions of the Evicted Tenants Act in this case.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that proceedings have been instituted for the sale to them of these lands under the provisions of the Irish Land Act, 1903. It would be contrary to the established practice to state the reasons which actuate the Commissioners in the exercise of their discretion.

Distribution of Untenanted Land on the Massey Estate.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say what steps the Estates Commissioners have taken to acquire the untenanted land on the Massey estate, situate at Glenville and Ballylin, in the County of Limerick; and whether there is any likelihood of an agreement in the matter being come to.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have had a preliminary inspection made of the lands referred to with a view to intimating to the owner the price they will be prepared to advance if formal proceedings for the sale of the lands are instituted. The Commissioners are not at present in a position to say whether an agreement is likely to be arrived at.

Evicted Tenants—Application of Mrs. B. O'Connell.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say whether the Estates Commissioners have received an application from Mrs. Bridget O'Connell, of Ards, Ballygran, Charleville, in the County of Limerick, evicted tenant, for a portion of the untenanted lands at Cappananty, on the estate of Captain Lyons; and, if so, whether, having regard to the fact that her people lived on the estate, and also to the fact that she has three sons who are able to work land and who have good recommendations as to character, they will favourably consider her claim.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have received an application from Mrs. Bridget Connell in reference to a holding of three and a half acres at one time occupied by her husband. The Commissioners have decided to take no action in the matter.

Delay in Reinstatement of Evicted Tenants on the Waller Estate.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say what is the cause of delay on the part of the Estates Commissioners in reinstating and making provision for the evicted tenants on the Waller estate at Pallaskenry and other districts in the County of Limerick.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have notified in the Dublin Gazette their intention of acquiring compulsorily under the Evicted Tenants Act certain lands on the Waller estate. The lands have been inspected, and the Commissioners will, in due course, consider their inspector's report with a view to making an offer under the Act.

Sick Leave of Colonial Office Staff in British East Africa.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Croydon): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether a regulation or order has recently been issued in British East Africa by the Colonial Office limiting the period of illness on the sick list for officials to ten days at one time, or twenty-eight days in the year, after which such officials are to be placed on half-pay, and if such order has been incorporated in the provincial gazettes throughout British East Africa.

(Answered by Colonel Seely.) Such a regulation was recently issued, but the Secretary of State has approved of its withdrawal, and in future a maximum of forty-five days sick leave per annum will be allowed.

Subsidies to Steamship Lines.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the conditions attaching to a subsidy in Germany for a steamship line prohibit any change in the rate of freight without the consent of the Imperial Chancellor, and in Austria without the consent of the Minister of Commerce; and whether any steps are to be taken in regard to all future subsidies to prevent the undue raising of freights against British traders and any action in restriction of trade.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) I am aware that the subsidies granted to certain steamship lines in Germany and Austria have been subject to the condition stated. Payments made to British steamship companies by His Majesty's Government are, generally speaking, payments for services rendered, and their amount would presumably have to be increased if the regulation of freight rates were made an invariable condition. I will consider whether any steps are necessary with regard to the matter when the Royal Commission on Shipping Rings and Conferences has issued its Report.

MR. BELLAIRS: To ask the President of the Board of Trade in reference to the subsidy agreement of the Cunard Steamship Company of 30th July, 1903, under Part I., Article (5), to carry on its business to the best advantage, not unduly to raise the freights or charges for the carriage of goods in any of its services, and to give no undue preference as against British subjects, what check the Board of Trade are able to impose to see that the agreement is carried out in spirit as well as in letter; whether any conflict of opinion has yet arisen; and whether similar conditions have been imposed in the case of any other subsidy.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The Board of Trade carefully investigate any complaints made to them with regard to the freight rates charged by the Cunard Steamship Company, and if there should in any case be reason to suppose that the rate was unduly raised or gave an undue preference as against British subjects the matter would be taken up with the company. There has been no conflict of opinion with regard to this matter between the Board and the company. Conditions regulating to some extent rates of freight are to be found in the contract of 19th April, 1900, with Messrs. Elder Dempster and Company for a steamship service between Jamaica and the United Kingdom (Cd. 175), and in the contract of 29th August, 1907, with the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company with respect to the West Indian Inter-Colonial mail service (Parliamentary Paper, No. 24). I understand that the Post Office mail contracts with the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company contain clauses prohibiting undue preference being given as against British subjects. The Board have no reason to think that the Cunard Company have not fully complied with the provisions of the agreement both in spirit and letter.

MR. BELLAIRS: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the Annual Report on the Straits Settlements for the year 1907, and to pages 48 and 49, dealing with the effect on trade due to the action of shipping conferences and the hardships inflicted on British tramp steamers and sailing vessels, which have been almost entirely driven out of a trade in which they used largely to participate; and whether, in the event of no legislation being contemplated by the Government next year in reference to shipping rings and conferences, the Government will consider the advisability of holding a conference, in which the self-governing Colonies and the Dependencies of the Empire may participate, to consider whether it is advisable to strengthen the law in regard to combinations in restraint of free trade or to take any other action.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) My attention has been called to the Report to which my hon. friend refers. The whole question of shipping rings and conferences is at present being inquired into by a Royal Commission. The Report of the Commission will, I understand, be issued shortly, and the advisability of legislative or other action dealing with this subject will then be considered.

The Salvation Army.

MR. W. T. WILSON (Lancashire, Westhoughton): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Salvation Army is registered as a trading company; and, if so, whether it makes the Returns to the Board of Trade as required by the Companies Acts, and whether it supplies the particulars as required by the Census of Production Act.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The Salvation Army is not registered under the Companies Acts and does not make any of the Returns required by those Acts. There is, however, on the register a company limited by guarantee called the Salvation Army Assurance Society, Limited, which renders the Returns required of companies so limited. There are also on the register other companies formed for the purpose of purchasing land and buildings for the use of the Salvation Army in different parts of the United Kingdom. Instances of these are the Southend Citadel Company, Limited, and the Willesden Green Citadel Company, Limited. These Companies are limited by shares and render the Returns required of companies so limited. The Salvation Army is liable to supply particulars under the Census of Production Act in respect of the numerous trades in which it is engaged, and schedules of questions have been issued to it in the ordinary course.

House of Commons—Rooms for Officials.

MR. PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.): To ask the First Commissioner of Works if he would enumerate the number of rooms in this House used by Ministers and Members of Parliament, stating the office or position for which each room is allotted.

(Answered by Mr. L. Harcourt.) Rooms are provided for all Ministers, for the Leaders of the Conservative, Unionist, Irish, Welsh, and Labour Parties, and for the Whips of the Government, Opposition, Irish, and Labour Parties.

Government Contracts—Pay of Carpenters.

MR. W. T. WILSON: To ask the First Commissioner of Works if he is aware that, according to the Report of the Labour Department of the Board of Trade, the wages of carpenters and joiners working within a radius of twelve miles of Charing Cross are given as 10½d. per hour; and whether, in view of this fact, he will insist upon all firms who secure Government work within this radius over which he has control paying 10½d. per hour to the carpenters in their employ.

(Answered by Mr. L. Harcourt.) The Report referred to gives information

furnished to the Board of Trade by associations connected with the building trade. It represents an agreement arrived at between the London Master Builders' Association and the London Trade unions. From the best information I can obtain the rate of 10½d. an hour adopted in this agreement for carpenters is not, to use the language of the Fair Wages Resolution of this House, "generally accepted as current in the trade for competent workmen," as between local employers and workmen, in certain places in the outer fringe of the area within the twelve-mile radius; and it appears that the London associations have not been able to enforce a rate of 10½d. for carpenters in those districts, although in some instances that rate is paid. Having regard to the terms of the Resolution of the House I do not see how I can compel contractors in those districts to pay the 10½d. rate where I find that there is another and lower rate locally current.

Barrow-in-Furness Distress Committee.

MR. BELL (Derby): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can state when the distress committee was formed in Barrow-in-Furness; how many unemployed workmen had registered their names on the unemployed register; when did the distress committee apply for a grant from the Government's unemployed fund; when was the grant made; and for how much.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The official papers relating to this matter are in the hands of my inspector who is holding an inquiry to-day at Barrow and I cannot therefore give precise replies to all these Questions. I may say, however, that the distress committee was formed in 1905, that the number of registered applicants on 9th November was 1,757, and that on the 14th instant a payment of £500 was made to the committee, and a similar payment on the 16th.

Lowrybane and Ougherdrum Estates— Restoration of Evicted Tenants.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have acquired, or are in course of acquiring, the lands of Lowrybane and Ougherdrum, near Castlecauldwell, County Fermanagh; and, if so, are these lands untenanted lands, and will they be made available for the restoration of evicted tenants residing in the district, and, amongst others, of John Graham of Banagh, Clonkelly, who lives within a few miles and has a strong and willing family well able to work a holding.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I would refer the hon. Member to my reply to his previous Question of 4th February last on this subject. I have nothing to add to that reply at present.

Cost of Irish Land Policy.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will lay upon the Table of the House the calculations which purport to show that £180,000,000 will probably be required for completing the policy of land purchase under the Irish Land Act, 1903.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I have not suggested that £180,000,000 will probably be required to complete land purchase. I named that amount as the present estimate of the size of the problem as existing in 1903, assuming that land purchase was to be carried through to completion. A Return showing how that estimate was arrived at will be laid upon the Table in the course of a few days.

Distribution of Grant to Irish National School Teachers.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, as the supplementary grant of £114,000 was voted to increase the salaries of all national teachers in Ireland and its distribution regulated by Parliament, he will state on what authority the Commissioners of National Education are acting in imposing new conditions as to the future distribution of the grant.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that they have imposed no new conditions as to the future distribution of the grant.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act to consolidate Enactments relating to the Post Office." [Post Office Consolidation Bill [Lords].]

POST OFFICE CONSOLIDATION BILL [LORDS].

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES.)

[Sir WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Member from the Standing Committee on Scottish Bills: Mr. Waldron; and had appointed in substitution (in respect of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) and the Local Government (Scotland) Bills): Mr. Walrond.

Report to lie upon the Table.

QUESTIONS ON FRIDAY.

MR. CORRIE GRANT (Warwickshire, Rugby) said he wished to ask the Home Secretary a Question of which he had given the right hon. Gentleman private notice.

*MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman is not present.

MR. CORRIE GRANT: May I address it to the Under-Secretary?

*MR. SPEAKER: He is not here.

MR. CORRIE GRANT: That being so, what remedy have I?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member can put down a Question for Monday.

MR. CORRIE GRANT: As there are forty Members present, may I ask leave to call attention to the matter on a Motion for adjournment?

*MR. SPEAKER: The adjournment of the House cannot be moved on Friday.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (ENGLAND AND WALES) [GRANTS].

Committee to consider of authorising the payment of certain Parliamentary Grants in pursuance of any Act of the present session to make further provision with respect to Elementary Education in England and Wales (King's Recommendation signified), upon Monday next.—(Mr. Runciman.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (ENGLAND AND WALES) (No 2) BILL) (ALLOCATION OF TIME).

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): The House is aware that it is never to me a congenial task to submit one of these procedure Resolutions, and on the present occasion, for obvious reasons, I approach that duty with exceptional reluctance. The peculiar and, indeed, unique circumstances in which this Bill originated are familiar to all of us, and obviously it could not pass through all its stages in this House without these facilities being given to it. I had at one time hoped it would be possible; but further inquiry has shown me that, in view of the time of year which we have reached, and the necessity of the Bill becoming law promptly, some moderate curtailment of time, and some proper allocation of time, is indispensably necessary. I am quite sure there is not a man on either side in this House who does not know as well as I do that if no such Resolution were adopted there is not the remotest chance of this Bill ever reaching the House of Lords in time for passing into law in the present year. It may be said—Why did we not introduce it earlier? But this Bill, as hon. Gentlemen on both sides know, is the result of prolonged communications and negotiations carried on for months on a subject of very exceptional difficulty, and between parties whose interests for a long time appeared irreconcilable. At the very first moment that those negotiations approached, I will not say a conclusion, but within measurable distance of a conclusion, this Bill was drafted and presented to the House without delay. Therefore, the Government cannot charge themselves with any neglect in this matter. If that be so, and I think I am stating facts which, whatever dialectical arguments we may resort to, are facts familiar to us all and indisputable, the substantial question is whether in the Resolution which I have put down adequate time is given to the discussion of the subject as a whole, and, next, whether a reasonable proportion of time has been given to different branches of the subject. Upon the first point I may remind the House of two things. The subject-matter with which we are dealing is in no sense novel. There is not a single argument relative or material to it which has not done duty on previous Bills on the platform and in the House of Commons. But quite apart from that, as I ventured to remind the House yesterday, the real question which arises in this case is not so much what can be said on the matter of principle for or against these particular provisions, but whether the various provisions, taken together, after proper scrutiny, do or do not constitute a reasonable and satisfactory view of the situation. I think one illustration will show the House what I mean by a perfectly reasonable view of the situation. Take the case which is provided for by the second clause. The proposed right of entry is given for the first time to denominational teachers in provided schools. In our view, whether we are right or wrong, that is an essential part of this compromise. You might discuss for months whether the right of entry is right; but in our view it is an essential and integral part of the arrangement. Therefore, I would submit that any discussion on what I may call the abstract merits at this stage is not a relevant discussion. On the other hand, whether or not the apprehension which I find is expressed in some quarters deserving of the highest respect as to whether the right of entry is or is not clearly defined and adequately safeguarded against possible suppression is well-grounded, is a most material point, and is a matter upon which the Committee might reasonably spend its time. I give that only as an illustration to show what is the true function of the Committee on a Bill presented in such circumstances and with such a peculiar origin as that now before the House. That being so, it appears to us that, large and far-reaching as are the questions of principle raised by these five or six clauses, having regard to their interdependence as part of one scheme, an adequate amount of time will be given in the six days to make perfectly clear anything that is doubtful, to fill up any gaps that may exist, and to strengthen any safeguards that appear insufficiently secure, in order to see that the arrangement as a whole is carried through. I come now to the allocation of time as between the different subjects in the Bill. We propose to give the whole of the first day to the discussion of the first clause, the one that sets up what I may call the general national system, under which all schools assisted by rate aid will require to be under the control of the public authority, with the teachers to be appointed by that authority, and so forth. That is what I may call, using rough and popular language, the great concession to Nonconformist opinion, and no doubt it requires a whole day for its discussion. I am assuming what is to be the proper function of Committee in relation to a Bill of this kind. Nobody would cheer more loudly than I if a solution of the education question could be embodied in a Bill containing only that one clause. On the second day I propose to deal with the second clause, giving what is known as the right of entry. This, to use again popular language, is the granting of the counter-vailing concession to the denominationalists. On the third day we put forward—and this is most important—the Report stage of the Financial Resolutions. On that can be raised the whole question, dealt with in the Bill and the Schedules, of the present principle and general effect of the proposed financial arrangements, as to whether or not this is a fair bargain with regard to contracting-out schools. This is relative to Clause 3, which is grouped with it, and provides for contracting out. On the fourth day we come to matters that are not unimportant though of subordinate importance. Clauses 4 and 5 provide for the transfer of the existing voluntary schools to the public authority. Clause 6, to be taken in the first part of the next day, deals with the same subject matter and the remainder of that day is given to the three following clauses about which I do not think there is any controversy. Clauses 11 and 12 are formal and will be taken on the last day with Clause 10, which is an important one because it deals with the unification of grants to the local authority. The Schedules will also be taken on that day.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) :
And the new clauses ?

MR. ASQUITH : If there be any.

LORD R. CECIL : There are some on the Paper now.

MR. ASQUITH : I was not aware of that. If there are any new clauses they will be discussed then. I think that is a fair allocation as between the different subject matters of the clauses. If, for the reasons that I have stated, the House agrees, however reluctantly, with the Government that if the Bill is to pass into law some compulsory allocation of time must be made, then I hope that they will further agree that after a good deal of thought we have placed on the Table a reasonable and practicable scheme which they will be disposed to accept. I beg to move.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Committee Stage, Report stage, and Third Reading of the Elementary Education (England and Wales) (No. 2) Bill, and the necessary stages of the Financial Resolution relating thereto, shall be proceeded with as follows:—1. Committee stage. Six allotted days shall be given to the Committee stage of the Bill, including the necessary stages of the Financial Resolution relating to the Bill, and the proceedings on each of those allotted days shall be those shown in the second column of the table annexed to this Order, and those proceedings shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion at the time shown in the third column of that table. 2. Report stage. Two allotted days shall be given to the Report stage of the Bill, and the proceedings for each of those allotted days shall be such as may be hereafter determined in manner provided by this Order, and those proceedings, if not previously brought to a conclusion, shall be brought to a conclusion at 10.30 p.m. on each such allotted day. 3. Third Reading. One allotted day shall be given to the Third Reading of the Bill, and the proceedings thereon shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion at 10.30 p.m. on that day. On the conclusion of the Committee stage the Chairman shall report the Bill to the House without Question put, and the House shall on a subsequent day, consider the proposals made by the Government for the allocation of the proceedings on the Report stage of the Bill. The proceedings on the consideration of those proposals may be entered on at any hour, though opposed, and shall not be interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House, but if they are not brought to a conclusion before the expiration of one hour after they have been commenced, Mr. Speaker shall, at the expiration of that time, bring them to a conclusion by putting the Question on the Motion proposed by the Government, after having put the Question, if necessary, on any Amendment or other Motion which has been already proposed from the Chair and not disposed of. After this Order comes into operation, any day shall be considered an allotted day for the purposes of this Order on which the Bill is put down as the first Order of the Day, or on which any stage of the Financial Resolution relating thereto is put down as the first Order of the Day, followed by the Bill. Provided that 5 p.m. shall be substituted for 10.30 p.m., and 2 p.m. for 7.30 p.m. as respects any allotted day which is a Friday, and 3 p.m. shall be substituted for 10.30 p.m. and 12 noon for 7.30 p.m. as respects any allotted day which is a Saturday, as the time at which proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion under the foregoing provisions. A Motion may be made by a Minister of the Crown at the commencement of business on any day that the House sit on the following Saturday at 10 a.m. for the purpose of the consideration of the Bill, and the Question on any Motion so made shall be put forthwith by the Speaker without Amendment or debate. Notice of any Question requiring an oral answer for a Friday or Saturday shall, if that day is an allotted day under this Order, be treated as a notice for the following Monday. For the purpose of bringing to a conclusion any proceedings which are to be brought to a conclusion on an allotted day, and have not previously been brought to a conclusion, Mr. Speaker or the Chairman shall, at the time appointed under this Order for the conclusion of those proceedings, put forthwith the Question on any Amendment or Motion already proposed from the Chair, and shall next proceed successively to put forthwith the Question on any Amendments, new Clauses, or Schedules moved by the Government of which notice has been given, but no other Amendments, Clause, or Schedules, and on any Question necessary to dispose of the business to be concluded, and in the case of Government Amendments or of Government new Clauses or Schedules he shall put only the Question that the Amendment be made or that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill, as the case may be. A Motion may be made by the Government to leave out any Clause or consecutive Clauses of the Bill before the consideration of any Amendments to the Clause or Clauses in Committee. The Question on a Motion made by the Government to leave out any Clause or Clauses of the Bill shall be put forthwith by the Chairman or Speaker without debate. Any Private Business which is set down for consideration at 8.15 p.m. on any allotted day shall, instead of being taken on that day as provided by the Standing Order 'Time for taking Private Business,' be taken after the conclusion of the proceedings on the Bill or under this Order for that day, and any Private Business so taken may be proceeded with, though opposed, notwithstanding any Standing Order relating to the Sittings of the House. On any day on which any proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion under this Order, proceedings for that purpose under this Order shall not be interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to the Sittings of the House. On an allotted day no dilatory Motion on the Bill, nor Motion to re-commit the Bill, nor Motion for Adjournment under Standing Order 10, nor Motion to postpone a Clause, shall be received unless moved by the Government, and the Question on such Motion shall be put forthwith without any debate. Nothing in this Order shall—(a) prevent any business which under this Order is to be concluded on an allotted day being proceeded with on any other day, or necessitate any allotted day or part of an allotted day being given to any such business if the business to be concluded has been otherwise disposed of; or (b) prevent any other business being proceeded with on any allotted day or part of an allotted day in accordance with the Standing Orders of the House after the business to be proceeded with or concluded under this Order on the allotted day or part of the allotted day has been disposed of."

*MR. FORSTER (Ken^t, Sevenoaks): The right hon. Gentleman has made what I am sure is to him an unpalatable statement with all the urbanity and lucidity that we are accustomed to expect from him. He is indeed a past master in the art of persuasion. If it ever falls to my unhappy lot to suffer a severe and drastic surgical operation, there is no one in whom I would have greater confidence or to whom I would rather submit myself than the right hon. Gentleman. He told the House that the proposal is no novelty. It certainly is not. So accustomed are we to this drastic procedure that under ordinary circumstances and with an ordinary Bill we might not have thought it necessary to put the Amendment on the Paper. But the position is not ordinary. The circumstances of the situation clothe the dry bones of this proposition with an aspect which is wholly foreign to the traditions of the House. The right hon. Gentleman does not really fully understand what it is that we complain of in the Resolution he now submits and his treatment or proposed treatment of the remaining stages of the Bill. Let us consider for a moment what the circumstances are. The Bill was introduced less than a week ago, almost surreptitiously ["Oh"] at any rate sub silentio, possibly not implying thereby that the Government were ashamed of it, but perhaps implying that they were parting with something they treasured so dearly that they could hardly entrust it to the light of day. Under ordinary circumstances some little interval would have been allowed to elapse between the introduction and the Second Reading of an important measure of this kind. We are allowed two days. Under ordinary circumstances some decent interval would have been allowed between the conclusion of the Second Reading and the commencement of the Committee stage. What is the decent interval allowed now? One day. One Parliamentary day which is occupied by settling the further fate of the Bill. These are not all the circumstances which make our position somewhat singular to-day. The Bill itself is peculiar owing to the fact that it is the outcome of negotiations which have been pursued between the two parties to the long controversy which this Bill proposes to settle. They were negotiations in which we had no opportunity of making ourselves heard at all, and of which we were in ignorance until the very moment the Bill was introduced. It is true that there were various rumours and suggestions in the newspapers from time to time. It is true that those of us, and there are many of us, who are most anxious to take this opportunity of settling this question, watched those negotiations with all the interest of which we were capable, in the hope that some good might proceed from them; but neither we, nor, I think, some of those who actually took part in those negotiations, were quite prepared for the provisions of the Bill as it has been introduced. I think there is reason to believe that the Archbishop himself was somewhat uneasy at the very moment the Bill was introduced. Let us remember that the Archbishop has acted throughout these negotiations on his own responsibility. Let it be remembered that he is head of the English Church. He is in a position of great power. Without his cordial and active co-operation, his future co-operation, it is evident that it is impossible for this Bill to effect a real solution of the difficulty which lies before us ["Hear, hear."] Yes; if his co-operation with the Government is necessary, our support of him is also necessary. But neither his co-operation with you nor our support of him will suffice unless you give us time to discuss this matter with one another. There can be no hope of a lasting settlement unless we can bring into line to co-operate with us, the whole weight of that public opinion, religious and political, which has supported the voluntary school movement for the last thirty years. There is no time under this closure proposal to collect or to focus that opinion. And, if I may say so, it is not only the friends of the Church who are concerned in this matter. I saw, and was happy to see, that at the very moment, or even before this Bill was introduced, a committee was being formed—a committee which has grown with a rapidity which I should say has astonished those who were responsible for its initiation—a committee friendly to a possible settlement, and even that committee were in ignorance of what the Bill really contained. I see in the newspapers of to-day a letter from the Bishop of London about which I will not say more than that it leads me to think at the time he joined this committee he was not familiar with all the provisions which the Bill contains. There never was a Bill which demanded time so much. Here is a Bill which is designed to reconcile old differences, a Bill which professes to come as a message of conciliation and of peace. You propose to force this measure through the House of Commons as if it was the most hotly debated and contentious Bill with which you have been concerned. What a strange method of conciliation! It is not so much a question of conciliating political opponents as it is a question of conciliating those who aim at the same objects at which you are aiming, and who are willing to support you if they can convince themselves that by supporting you they will effect a real and lasting settlement. It seems to me that it is conciliation not of those who differ from you in their aim, but of those who differ from you in their estimate whether a settlement is likely to be reached. A settlement is only possible if those who set their hands to it do so knowing fully and accurately what it is to which they subscribe. Agreements may be reached, I think often are reached, in private conversation and in correspondence which yet leave loopholes for misunderstanding when the terms which seem so easy to comprehend in private conversation and correspondence find expression in the dry language of Parliamentary draftsmen. It seems to me that that is the kind of situation in which we find ourselves today. If I am right, then I say again that time is essential for an interchange of opinions, which can only find full and accurate expression in an atmosphere which is free from the dust of party politics. I cannot help thinking that hasty and precipitate action on the part of the Government will now go far to wreck the whole scheme which is embodied in their proposals. Speaking for myself, I say that it would be a thousand pities if such a thing were to happen. Never have the two parties been so close together. What a pity it would be if the hands that are now outstretched across the dormant embers of this long and bitter struggle, failed to close in friendly grasp. I think that if failure be the result, the responsibility would rest largely with the Government.

a settlement—a settlement, the fabric of which may be erected on the basis of this Bill. Some have hope that a settlement may be arrived at, some apparently have none. I have hope. I still hope, though I confess that the proceedings of the last few days have caused the flame of hope that burned so brightly a week ago, to dwindle down to the merest spark. Hope dies hard. I voted for the Second Reading of the Bill last night because I would not abandon the faint hope that is left to me that Amendments may be made which will convert this Bill into a real treaty of peace, and until I learn from the lips of the Government themselves that they refuse to meet us on points which we consider vital, I shall continue to keep that spark of hope alive. We cannot make peace by merely shifting the scene of hostilities from one part of the field to another. We cannot make a treaty of peace by simply shifting the scene of hostilities from the political platform and the House of Commons, to the election and the council chamber of the local education authority. I say once again that if you really want peace, you must give us time. Why not? The Prime Minister in his opening remarks referred to the fact that we are now coming towards the close of the session. He said unless we are able to carry this Bill through the House of Commons in time for it to go to another place we should arrive at the end of the session, and this Bill would not be carried at all. Yes; we are nearing the end of the session, and as the right hon. Gentleman reminded us yesterday, the session has been full of hard work, and no one knows better than hon. Gentlemen who sit on these benches how hard that work has been. Although we are near the close of this session, we are within measurable distance of the beginning of another session which will begin all too soon. Supposing in the interests of a settlement the Government were to postpone the further consideration of this measure until then, what loss would there be? Can the loss of a few weeks of Parliamentary time weigh against the solution of that problem which has baffled both parties for so long? Is it not worth while to allow of some little lecting a permanent Can it be that the aid of their own

division of last night should reassure them on that point. Can it be that they are afraid that further consideration would alienate the sympathies of those of us who sit on this side of the House, and who are at present friendly to their proposals? Time and time alone can bring together the whole of the parties who sit here to support the Bill. What time is given? The right hon. Gentleman yesterday referred to the fact that after the twenty years of comparative peace that ensued upon the Act of 1870, we have been engaged during the last twelve or thirteen years in an almost ceaseless conflict upon the education question. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to end the struggle that has been going on for twelve years by forcing through this Bill in twelve days. Twelve Parliamentary days are sufficient, in his view, to close in peace a struggle which has lasted twelve years. The proposal is almost grotesque. I think the right hon. Gentleman would have recognised how grotesque it is if his finer feelings were not blunted by the constant and incessant use of the weapon which he now employs. It has become a part of the settled system of this Government to subject each of their important proposals to a Resolution of this character. Some Resolutions seem to be a little more drastic than others; some of them seem to be a little longer than others, but the process is always invariably the same, and the object is to stifle debate in the present House of Commons. It has become their stereotyped method of conducting business. Let me remind the House that this is the growth of only three years. Any Member who has sat in Parliaments previous to this one must know that this method of closure was only employed when it became perfectly evident that there was grave and insuperable obstruction on the part of those in opposition.

MR. ASQUITH: What I said was that it was a very bad plan to wait for obstruction and then to introduce a Resolution.

*MR. FORSTER: The right hon. Gentleman does not quarrel with my original proposition that this method of conducting business has grown up in the last three years, and this is the stereotyped method by which the Government intend to carry on their business. They are supported by the greatest majority of modern times. They are faced by the weakest Opposition numerically that the House has seen for generations.

AN HON. MEMBER: What about the House of Lords?

*MR. FORSTER: I did not know the right hon. Gentleman was able to pass any Resolution of this kind in this House which was able to stifle the debate in the House of Lords. But while the right hon. Gentleman has stereotyped this method of preventing full discussion, the Government have invariably allowed some decent interval—some breathing space, between the Second Reading and the Committee stage, and here we have that small right, which we have come to regard as our own, taken from us. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Islington claimed that in this matter private Members ought to have the right of full freedom of debate. The right hon. Gentleman speaks with that freedom from restraint which is probably less refreshing to his former colleagues, than it evidently is to himself. At any rate, I can claim the sympathy and respect of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Islington, and I trust before the debate closes he will give full expression to his passionate desire for full and unfettered freedom of debate. I know quite well no representations that we can make, however earnest and sincere, will avail with the Government for a single moment. They have made up their minds. They intend to force this Bill through the House of Commons, and I am afraid—I speak with honest disappointment—nothing I can say will move them to change their course. Let us look the facts full in the face and see where it is that we are going, if we persist in conducting business in this fashion. It is but a step from the present method to a plan by which some future Government may introduce a Resolution of this kind allocating the whole time of the session to measures which they intend to lay before it. That is a danger which we need not apprehend from the present Government, because they change their plans and their policy so constantly that it would be a method of conducting business which would obviously be impossible to them. But some Government may adopt such when they do, those hon. Gentlemen opposite, who will then have an opportunity of considering such a proposal, will find that their acquiescence and support of the drastic and violent methods of the Government will render their future protestations completely ineffectual. By the action that they take now they will shut themselves off from the opportunity of making full and effective protest in Parliaments to come. I really would ask the Government to reconsider this matter before it is too late. If they are sincere, and we believe them to be sincere, in the efforts they are making to still the clamour that has rung in our ears for the last ten or twelve years; if they are anxious, as we are, to end this long and bitter struggle; if they want to secure the co-operation of that great volume of common sense which can only make itself heard when party strife is silent, I would ask them to give the House and the country time to think. The Government has a great and golden opportunity, and if by hasty and precipitate action they waste it, the responsibility for their failure will be theirs alone.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 1, to leave out all the words after 'That,' and to add the words 'this House, being of opinion that a settlement of the education question by general agreement is urgently required, and that such agreement can only be secured if the views of all parties interested are fully discussed by this House, regrets that exceptional means of curtailing debate should be used to force precipitately through its remaining stages a measure touching complicated interests and rousing vehement feelings.'"—(Mr. Forster.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'the Committee stage, Report stage,' stand part of the Resolution.

MR. BELLOC (Salford, S.) said he wished to say with as little acerbity or violence as possible that the Catholic body demanded, particularly under the special circumstances, a full discussion of the clauses as they affected them. He neither affirmed nor denied the necessity in general of longer discussions than the Government had granted, but he advised it on that particular point. If there was one thing in the Bill in regard to which 2,000,000 people were asking what the issue would be without any reference to whether they voted Liberal or Conservative, it was that part which related to the Roman Catholic schools. The Catholic body was united in protesting against certain elements contained in the Bill, but it was not yet united with regard to the alternative proposals which it desired to make. How would it be possible within the limits of one day to debate that vital subject? It could not be debated. He had just come from a Catholic meeting at Liverpool, where he had seen a quarter of the population of the town, and feeling on this subject was more intense there than on any other subject of political thought. They were, if the House could conceive such a thing, feeling it more than they would feel the fall of Consols which would occur when the first Tariff Commission sat. They were feeling it more than they would feel some physical disaster, or loss of employment and wages. He regretted his attitude should be in opposition to the point of view of the Government. He recognised that the Bill must go through soon, and he recognised that this was an attempt for the greater part of the population at a compromise. He sympathised with that attempt, but the Catholics demanded fuller discussion of the clauses affecting them than they would get under the Government Resolution.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.): If I take the rather unusual course of rising so soon after my hon. friend, with every word of whose speech I am in sympathy, it is because I have had no opportunity of saying a word on this Bill. I take the very deepest interest in it, and unless I rise now I should be prevented from making any appeal to the Government. It is the misfortune of many of us during an autumn session, a misfortune which has a bearing on the question which we are now discussing, that that is the time which is usually devoted by hon. Members to meeting the electorate, and many of us have engagements, made a long time ago, concerning a great number of other people, which we are unable to break, and which themselves limit our opportunities of taking part in the discussions. In a short time I have to leave the House to fulfil one of those engagements, and that is the reason I speak now. I think I occupy in some respects a rather peculiar position in reference to this education question. I was brought up as a Nonconformist in the midst of Nonconformist surroundings. I remain a member of the body in which I was born, and I think from those associations I have perhaps a greater appreciation of the point of view of Nonconformists and perhaps a greater kindness for them which cannot always be shared by those who have not my opportunities of knowing them intimately and well. On the other hand, my present associations for a long time have brought me into close touch with Churchmen. I can appreciate their views even where I do not share them. I am not one of the militant section of Nonconformists which thinks the great aims of Nonconformity can only be prosecuted at the expense of the Established Church. I am therefore from this middle position earnestly and anxiously desirous of finding some common ground of agreement on a controversy which has lasted so long and which has had such deplorable results for all the great interests which are involved. That being my position I voted for the Second Reading of the Bill last night and hope to be able to vote for the Third Reading. It would not be reasonable to ask a pledge of any man at this stage, but I desire to support the Bill through all its stages, and I believe there is still an opportunity to find, within the principles which it lays down and without calling upon either of the parties to the dispute for any sacrifice of their principles, an enduring settlement of this long-standing and bitter controversy. That, I know, is the object of the Government, but that is a tremendous undertaking. The Government have introduced into this House many large measures, but this is by far the biggest thing the Government have yet attempted. To produce a one-sided solution of this or of any question is a comparatively easy matter. To produce a solution which shall secure so great a body of agreement on all sides as to render it an enduring settlement is the heaviest, the most difficult task that any Government could undertake. It is the most responsible task upon which this House can employ its energies. If that be so, surely when we think we see an agreement within the bounds of possibility it is folly to abandon any chance of success or to do anything which lessens the prospects of a satisfactory result. On what does the chance of our providing a permanent settlement depend? It depends not on the views of extremists on one side or the other, but upon the extent to which we are successful—I use the word “we” because we are anxious to co-operate with the Government in the matter—in securing the great body of moderate opinion which lies between these two extremes. It depends upon whether, when the Bill passes, it has the support of a sufficiently large body of central opinion, and whether it is launched with the prospect that that body of central opinion will tend to grow and the body of extremist opinion to diminish. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to the settlement which was secured for so many years by the Act of 1870. I have lived among those who took a very active part in that controversy, who were not at all satisfied with the solution which was reached, but who nevertheless submitted to it, and by doing their best to work it, made it the success it has been for so long. But does the right hon. Gentleman think that that result would have been secured if those who objected to the settlement of 1870, whether they were Nonconformists or Churchmen, had not felt that their case had been fully laid before Parliament, and their views fully discussed, and that if at the end Parliament decided against them, at any rate Parliament had given the fullest consideration to that which they had to urge? I do not see how we can hope to gather in that great body of moderate public opinion which I think it is still within possibility that we may secure for the settlement of this question, unless every man feels that his case has been fairly heard, and that this great tribunal of the nation has not stopped the case while important arguments which he wished to urge were unheard. I feel this so strongly—I feel that upon the resolution which the Government takes now depends so largely the prospects of the future success of their measure—that I most earnestly beg them to reconsider the attitude which they have taken up. I do not say this in criticism or in blame of the Government, who, I understand, have been in a position of extraordinary difficulty, but I think we see already the danger and the evil of too great haste. The Government—the Prime Minister and the Minister for Education—entered into negotiations with the Archbishop and the Bishops on the one hand, and the Nonconformists on the other. They brought them within measurable distance of one another. That is common ground. I wish they had given a little more time to bridge, by way of negotiation, the small gulf that still divides them. In order to put the House in possession of their views at the earliest possible moment, in order to get on with the Bill, they produced it before the negotiations were complete, and I cannot but feel from what we have seen since, and the divergences of opinion now disclosed amongst the negotiators themselves as to the result of their negotiations, that the few days gained by presenting the Bill before the negotiations were complete were so many days actually lost in the prospect of the settlement of the question. I am anxious that that mistake, made with the best intentions, should not be repeated while the Bill is on its passage through the House. What is it that we desire—I should hope every man in the House, whatever his view as to the provisions of the Bill, and still more those of us who think we see in it a possible solution. We desire that the greatest possible number of schools should come within the system, that there should be the smallest number of schools desiring to take advantage of the provisions which relate to contracting-out. For the educational success of the measure apart from its religious side it is of the utmost importance that the scheme which the Government designate the normal national scheme, should embrace as many of the schools of the country as possible. Is time wasted that is spent in assuring, by discussion, by consideration, by Amendment if necessary, those whom you invited into your scheme that when they come into it they should be certain of fair treatment? Surely no time that we ask for in reason, in order to satisfy those whom we wish to rally to the support of the solution, will be wasted if it helps to bring in more people voluntarily and gladly to accept the provisions of the Bill, and to convince them that what the Government have expressed to be their intentions will in fact be the result of their measure. On the other hand, we all have to recognise whatever

Church schools and possibly some other denominational schools, will have to stand outside that system. You are asking those whom you put outside the normal national system to make a great sacrifice. You are asking them to give up their share in what you declare to be the national education of the nation to which they belong and of which they are as loyal and patriotic citizens as any others. Is not a little time well spent in trying to reconcile them to their position, in trying to meet their difficulties, and in assuring them that at any rate the House of Commons is willing to listen to all they have to say, anxious if it can to make their position more tolerable and less burdensome? You cannot deal with matters like these in a single afternoon. We do not know until we begin to discuss the Bill what shades of opinion will develop—what points will be raised. All we know is that we have entered on the most difficult task that any House of Commons can set itself, that upon the skill, the patience, the consideration which we give to this measure, and which we show in our relations to one another, depends our prospect of success, and under these circumstances, to ask us to be tied down to a few short days, at a time of year when it is exceedingly difficult for any of us to promise constant day to day attendance in consequence of our other public engagements, when many of us would probably get no opportunity of speaking, particularly those who represent the middle and central opinion, because it would be the extremists who would claim, and reasonably, the first right to be heard, on either side, and it will be the moderate men, who are most desirous of finding in the Bill a settlement, who will be crowded out—if you do that you handicap yourselves so heavily at the start that with all our anxious desire to find a settlement in the Bill, I should almost despair of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion. The House I hope will recognise the depth of my conviction and the earnestness of my wish for a settlement, and I most anxiously beg the Prime Minister to give the House latitude on this, because I believe it is only by and bad as it is for each one of us, I will grudge no labour that the Government exacts from us in order that we may have full time to discuss this measure. I will support them, if they think it necessary to adjourn over Christmas, I would try to meet them in whatever way of that kind they like, but I believe time is essential to a satisfactory solution, and if you do not give us time this great opportunity will be lost, and to lose the opportunity now that we have come so near to an agreement would be a calamity we should all regret for the rest of our lives.

MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester) joined in the appeals made from the front Opposition bench to the Government to reconsider this measure of closure. He had not yet made up his mind whether to go into the division lobby. He certainly did not like the wording of the Amendment. It did not express his feelings in opposition to the scheme which had been proposed. He wanted to ask the Government if it were quite impossible to add two extra days to this closure scheme. If they could add two days they would receive a great amount of willing support, which would now be given unwillingly, and a great amount of support which would not be given at all if they forced the scheme through in its present form.

MR. ASQUITH: Does the hon. Gentleman mean two days to the Committee stage?

MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD replied that he did. Some of them had hoped to put down Amendments to that effect, but owing to the severe pressure and to having work outside, many of them had been absolutely prevented from putting down any Amendments. He suggested that the time allotted to Clauses 1 and 2 and to the section including the Schedules was altogether inadequate. Another half day to Clause 1, another half day to Clause 2, and another day devoted to the Schedules, so far as he was concerned, would at any rate make the scheme of closure much more acceptable. He quite agreed with the position taken up by the Government fundamentally. The Bill was open to improvement. He opposed the Bill in some of its essential characteristics, but he was not going to press it in a factious way. He quite admitted that after due discussion and adequate consideration the Government were entitled to ask the House to pass the Bill. He also agreed that it was very much better to let the House now consider what the scheme of closure was going to be, rather than wait two or three days and then in a hurry and after perhaps inadequate consideration produce the scheme. He could not admit for a single moment from the constitutional point of view that the Government had any business to come to the House and say "We have arranged certain terms with outside parties, and you have to take these terms or reject them." As the representative of a constituency he could not recognise that doctrine. He might be wrong, but that was how the position of the Government struck him at the present time. They were told that there was no use discussing certain terms of this Bill. He was sorry to hear the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday that the only question which the House had to consider was whether the Bill would effect peace. It all depended on what was meant by peace. Whether the Bill was going to effect peace was a matter to be determined by the terms of peace which it contained, and therefore the House must insist upon, and the Government must give, an opportunity for discussing the terms of peace as well as the desirability or the efficacy of peace itself. The Prime Minister had said that there was nothing novel in the Bill. Practically everything in the Bill was novel. The fundamental novelty of the Bill was the position of the Government. He was perfectly certain that the Government had a very good reason for changing their opinion, but he did not know what the reason was. He was strongly opposed to the change, according to his present lights. The table indicating the time to be allotted to the Committee stage showed that Clause 2 with reference to the right of entry was to be dealt with in one day. He submitted that one day was not sufficient even to give adequate explanations of the clause. Even extremists—he did not object to that term being applied to himself in this matter—approached this question with the idea of having an adequate chance of putting their views before the House, of having them examined and discussed, and, more particularly, of having a statement from the Government why they had changed so fundamentally the position they had taken up during the last two years of the controversy. Clause 1 was to be dealt with in one day. First of all they must make up their minds as to whether the wording of subsection (a) was at all adequate to carry out what was intended. Then subsection (b) was a novel rendering of the Cowper-Temple clause. It changed its basis fundamentally and in such a way as surely to necessitate adequate discussion. Then there was the question whether fees should be imposed or not. He did not think the wording of the third subsection of the clause would effectively secure free places to all children who desired them. Surely the Government would admit that these four points were important and ought to be adequately discussed. At any rate, three of them were major points, and even if the House approached them without any intention of discussing them fundamentally and on principle, but simply for the purpose of finding out what the position of the Government was, whether they were essential to the compromise, and what their exact meaning was—surely the time allotted to them was not adequate for the purpose. The House should surely have an opportunity of discussing a Motion to delete Clause 2 in order that the principle embodied in the clause might be adequately explained. There was the question as to the time to be given to religious instruction, there was also the question of the position of the teachers, both headmasters and assistants, in regard to the giving of religious instruction. The financial provisions embodied in the fourth subsection of the clause seemed exceedingly pettifogging, but the Government had no doubt some good reason for what was proposed. Subsections 5 and 6 also involved important details. It was proposed that all those matters should be discussed in the short space of six hours. He was not going to approach this matter in an irreconcilable manner. He voted against the Second Reading of the Bill with a large regret. If, as the result of discussion in Committee, he himself to vote for the Third would be only too glad to do so, was conditional on fair and acrimonious, and he did not thin provided for in the scheme of closure now before the House.

Mr. ASQUITH: I rise now merely out of courtesy to the right hon. Gentleman opposite and my hon. friend who has just sat down. I listened with very great sympathy to the appeal made to me both by the hon. Member for Sevenoaks, who in an admirable speech moved the Amendment, and by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Worcestershire, because I know that both are genuine friends of a settlement of this matter. I am not quite so sure of the hon. Member for Leicester. He put forward certain Parliamentary considerations which are perfectly fair matters for discussion. As I have said, it is with great reluctance I make the Motion and I only make it in this form because it is the only chance of getting the Bill through on this side of Christmas, which I believe is generally desired. But I would make this suggestion in response to the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman. If it will facilitate progress, I propose—it is a very great sacrifice of Government time, but I am prepared to face it—to add two days to the Committee stage, thus giving eight instead of six. The effect of that will be to postpone from Saturday till Tuesday week the day on which the Schedules would be taken. That is rather important, because I am satisfied it will turn out the more this matter is discussed in Committee that the really open point, upon which the success of the chances of a settlement mainly depends, is as to the terms on which contracting-out is to be allowed. [An HON. MEMBER: "What about Clause 2?"] As regards Clause 2, I do not think we will have much trouble. If anybody can show that the right of entry is not sufficiently safeguarded, I am quite prepared to put in language that will make it abundantly clear. It is merely a point of draftmanship; the intention is absolutely clear. But as regards the scale of grants to contracted-out schools, and to some extent the rent or other consideration to be paid to transferred schools, there is at right hon. Gentleman said that that matter should be kept open as long as possible in order that the various persons concerned should have an opportunity of inter-communication and negotiation. They understand the point, and I am pretty sure that in the course of the next seven or eight days, after the discussions in the House and outside, they will be better able to come to an understanding; but it is desirable to put off as long as we can the necessity of coming to a final decision. If that proposal meets with general acceptance, if it eases the situation in the view of those who are genuinely anxious that the Bill should go through, I shall be prepared to make modifications in the Resolution, which will extend the Committee stage from six to eight days, and which will provide for that additional discussion, certainly upon Clause 2, and upon the financial parts, and particularly the Schedules, which, I think, in the opinion of the House and of those who desire a settlement, are the parts to which Committee discussion might be most profitably directed.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) asked what the right hon. Gentleman proposed to do in regard to Clause 2.

MR. ASQUITH: I propose to extend the time for Clause 2. At present it is confined to one day in the Committee stage. I propose to give another half-day at any rate. If the hon. Gentleman will wait a moment, we will have the exact details put before the House.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked whether some better opportunity would be given for the discussion of the new clauses. Under the present table the new clauses would be absolutely ruled out.

MR. ASQUITH: If we take the Schedules and the new clauses, and give them a day to themselves, the new clauses will have a better opportunity of being discussed.

MR. DILLON: Will the new clauses come after the Schedules?

MR. ASQUITH: No, before.

MR. DILLON: If the new clauses come after Clauses 10, 11, and 12 on the Mr. Asquith.

same day as proposed in the table, the new clauses will have no chance whatever of being discussed. Could not the new clauses be taken at the beginning of the day on which the Schedules are taken?

MR. ASQUITH: If the new clauses are taken on the same day as Clauses 10, 11, and 12, we can divide the day in half.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford), said the announcement made by the Prime Minister met to some extent the views of hon. Members. He urged that in re-arranging the time-table provision should be made to ensure some opportunity of discussing the third clause of the Bill. At present it was proposed to take it on the third day after the financial Resolution. If Clause 2 took a day and a half, it was possible that discussion on Clause 3 might be squeezed out altogether. He would most earnestly appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, notwithstanding the solid concession which he had made, still further to consider the view put forward by his hon. friend on the front bench. Personally, he was just as much as the right hon. Gentleman in favour of arriving at once at some compromise on this question. If he had been in the House the previous evening, as unfortunately he was not, he would have voted in favour of the Second Reading of the Bill, because he believed that the principles in it were founded on the only possible settlement of the question. But it seemed to him that the guillotine and a Bill to be taken by consent of the House were incompatible. It had been almost impossible during the Second Reading debate to get beyond the different matters dealt with in the various clauses. He agreed with the Prime Minister that they did not want so much these Second Reading discussions in Committee, but they could not avoid it. What was wanted was discussion in detail in order to discover how far the clauses of the Bill, as presented to the House, would carry out the understanding or any desire which they had for the purpose of bringing about peace. It did not seem to him that even with the concession which had been made, the House was likely to obtain the opportunity for a detailed discussion of all the points which might be hereafter arranged. Certainly, as far as the Schedules were concerned, they were assured that they were to have further time; but it must be remembered, and nobody knew it better than the Government, that when these negotiations were spoken of as concluded, they were not concluded. The Archbishop of Canterbury, so far as he was acting for the Church of England, was never satisfied with regard to the financial provisions, more especially on the question of contracting out and rent. Then there was the difficult question of expenditure during the last few years, which was in no way dealt with in the two Schedules, and which would have to be dealt with before the Bill became law. It was because he felt strongly that the hopes of peace were being shattered by the Bill being conducted under the guillotine that he urged the Government to give further time for the consideration of the points to which he had referred. It had been hinted that the hurried discussions of these clauses were to be taken not only in the Parliamentary time of next week, but were to be continued into the Saturday, when it would be impossible for all Members to be present. It seemed to him that there was every reason to ask the Government to hesitate before they laid this new stumbling stone on procedure. Hitherto, closure procedure had always been confined to controversial measures. But the Government put forward this Bill as a measure of compromise and concession, to be passed by consent, but with the knowledge that there would be outside opposition to it; and it seemed to him that to introduce into the procedure of the House this controversial method acting in regard to this Bill, was not only to introduce a new and dangerous precedent, but was likely to shatter the hopes of the Government and himself, that they had at last found a settlement of this extremely difficult question. The earliest date upon which it would be possible for the views of the Representative Council of the Church of England as a whole to be heard was 3rd December, when that council would meet; but by that date the Bill would be more than half-way through the Committee stage. That was the earliest meeting at which the opinion of the Church of England as a whole could be voiced, and yet they were asked to pass the first three clauses of the Bill before that date. The whole matter had been hurried on in order, apparently, that the House might adjourn before Christmas. That, however, was only a matter of the convenience of the followers of the Government and of Ministers. It was not a matter which affected a question that went to the root of the most difficult problem ever brought before Parliament. Surely time should be given for consideration, in order that, if possible, they might round off all the difficulties surrounding the situation felt by different sections of the religious life of the community. They could not effect a settlement unless the Roman Catholic Church was satisfied. The Government had allowed that in the negotiations they gave too little time to that particular part of the problem, and surely that was a proof of the necessity of giving more time in order that the House might deal in Committee with those questions which would have to be dealt with before a final settlement was attained. He believed that the only chance of obtaining the consent of all sections of the community and of smoothing out all the points of difficulty so as to reach a settlement which would be acceptable on all hands, would be to give a little more time for the fair consideration of the details of the measure. He appealed to the Government, with no party motive, but in their own interest, to give further consideration to the plea put forward by the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment.

MR. J. W. WILSON (Worcestershire, N.) said he would be inclined to ask the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken whether he believed that there was any other course of procedure than that proposed by the Government by which this Bill could be passed during the present session in view of the exhibition of hostility with which it had been received in certain quarters. He did not mean party quarters.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY said that if the hon. Member appealed to him he thought it would be quite possible to have a limited period after there had been time to consider whether the present difficulties could be smoothed over and rounded off.

MR. J. W. WILSON said he was going to suggest that there might be another alternative. Before the system of closure by compartments was adopted, the suspension of the eleven o'clock or the twelve o'clock rule was resorted to. During his experience of the House, which extended through three Parliaments, he could not put his finger on any Bill which had been opposed by any substantial section of the House which had been got through without a measure of closure by compartments. As far as he could remember the late Sir W. Harcourt's great Budget dealing with the death duties had passed through without the closure; and why? It was because, in his opinion, it was not subject to the twelve o'clock rule by the nature of the case. Since then, he repeated, there had no first class measures passed by either party in the House without the use of the closure by compartments.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London): During the ten years from 1895 to 1905, only three guillotine Motions were proposed, and I presume that in these years some important, some principal measures were passed.

MR. J. W. WILSON: There were not many principal measures in those years. [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh, oh."] Well, there was a great measure of Compensation in 1897, but that was in no sense controversial.

SIR F. BANBURY: And this measure is not controversial.

MR. J. W. WILSON said he would grant that it might not be controversial between the two front benches, but nobody could deny that there were strong minority sections in the House who felt conscientiously obliged to oppose it. Therefore he must contend that it should rank as one of the controversial measures brought before Parliament. However, what he rose for was to appeal to hon. Members on both sides of the House, not only to the Leaders who sat on the front benches, but particularly to the Leaders who sat on the back benches, to exercise their influence to pass a Bill which, to a large extent, had been brought in by consent, this session, even with the assistance of closure by guillotine. Anyone who looked back on the action of the closure by guillotine during the last few years, whether it was the

Mr. J. W. Wilson.

Licensing Bill, which had just left the House, or the Licensing Bill of 1904, or the Education Bill of 1902, or the Education Bill of 1906, could see that the opportunities afforded for discussion by the House had not been made proper use of by either party. Whatever party was in Opposition had felt it incumbent on them to show how easily they could waste the time of the House. In his opinion that was a degradation of debate and the procedure of the House, and he appealed to Members on both sides, whether on this Bill, or measures like it, they should not make the most of their debating power, instead of indulging, as had recently been the case, in increasing discursiveness which turned out not better but worse legislation. The result was that either another place was invited to throw the Bill out, or it was not so creditable and workmanlike a piece of legislation as many of them, quite apart from party or temporary motives, would like to feel that the House was capable of turning out. Therefore, he appealed to the House that whatever system of compartments was decided upon—and he was glad to hear that the Prime Minister had indicated some extension of the compartments on the Paper—or whether the House determined to suspend the eleven o'clock rule occasionally for the sake of extending the debate on most important subjects, they should try to make the best of their Parliamentary machinery and not the worst of it.

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) hoped he might be allowed to say a few words as he had not intervened in the debate hitherto. He had not had the honour of taking part in the former negotiations which it appeared had taken place, but he had taken a most active and energetic part in inducing his friends of the Church of England, in various assemblies and in private society, to uphold what some persons called the compromise, but what he preferred to designate by the less invidious term of the agreement. He also voted for the Second Reading of this Bill the evening before, and he was gratified that many of his hon. associates on that side of the House were to be found in the same lobby. It would be a great disappointment to them if the Bill did not become law. He did not say the Bill as it now stood, but he trusted it would be altered in the course of their discussion. There was, however, much to be said in favour of delay. The first argument that he thought an important one in a constitutional country was that from precedent. The custom of Parliament and of this House had never been to hurry forward measures contrary to the wishes and sentiments of those who desired to criticise and oppose, and when they looked beyond the shores of this country to foreign countries they found that in regard to those revolutionary periods when legislation or enactment, not of the character of legislation, were carried through in haste and with precipitation, those decisions had never become permanent, but were doomed to death from the day on which they became the law of those unfortunate countries. He would greatly regret if there was a tendency in that direction in this country, but he feared that there were symptoms of it, and he believed that if that movement was extended much further, it would bring great evils to this country, and it was quite possible that it might impair the authority even of this ancient, most venerable and honourable Assembly. When Prince Albert came to this country he made a remarkable observation—showing an acute mind—which was much challenged at the time. He said the institutions of this country—his adopted country—were on their trial; and his opinion was that if these modes of procedure were carried out, it might fairly be said that the House of Commons was on its trial. He was perfectly sure that whatever might be the votes of Parliament passed in this precipitate and hasty way, the authority of Parliament would be weakened by that mode of action and the representative institution damaged. He ventured to say that this haste and rapidity of movement was inconsistent with that confidence and intercourse which ought to exist between Members of the House themselves and between Members and of a satisfactory, and, he might say, constitutional character. Then they came to the present situation. What was it? There had been great hopes of an agreement. He had shared in those hopes and they were not extinguished now, but he believed that all persons who had experience in negotiations would agree with him when he said that when there were acute differences and opposition, and possibly heated feeling on one side or the other, still more when those conditions occurred on both sides, the real healer of these differences was not so much argument as time and patience and deliberation. It was wonderful, if both parties desired to come together, if one gave them an opportunity for deliberation and allowed their feelings to cool down, how in the course of a short time an agreement, apparently hopeless, became accomplished and became a reality. He believed there never was a time when the condition of educational affairs showed more improvement than on the present occasion. They had passed from a period of heat to a time when there was a prospect of agreement. At the present moment there were some grits in the machinery, and there was friction and impediment. What they wanted was, in his opinion, an opportunity of removing that friction and putting an end to those conditions. He asked that they should have an opportunity of so doing and taking some step, at any rate, to secure the solution of these difficult problems. According to the old saying of an experienced draftsman, as Lord Thring said to him time after time, the real plan was to make the first clause their Bill. The first clause had been the Bill in regard to these measures. It was the case with the Bill of the present Chief Secretary, and the Bill of the First Lord of the Admiralty, and with this Bill. He thought if they examined this Bill and read the first clause, they found there was considerable difficulty in making such alterations as would make it consistent with the real feelings and wishes of hon. Members on that side, and also of the Irish Roman Catholics in the borough of Wigan, he did possess the confidence of the English Roman Catholics, in saying a word for them on this occasion. He doubted whether the Government had really fully appreciated the vast importance of their own Bill. They desired, and he shared their desire, that this should be the occasion of a settlement, but except they had full appreciation of the difficulties of the situation, except they fully understood the enormous magnitude of the issues depending upon their deliberations, and if in forgetfulness or ignorance they were driven to rash and hasty and precipitate conclusions, they might depend upon it that the settlement would not be of a permanent character. It would be condemned to destruction from the very day when the new statute became law. Controversies would not cease and all feelings would not abate, but they would have from the moment the Bill was placed upon the Statute-book, new antagonisms, new controversies, and new bitternesses, and they would find themselves not nearer to an ultimate settlement, but much further from that happy conclusion than they were at present.

MR. ADKINS (Lancashire, Middleton) said he felt very strongly both the appeal of the hon. Member for the Seven-oaks division of Kent and of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Worcestershire, and was sure that with himself many hon. Members on that side of the House regretted that it was not possible to give more time to the discussion of many important details which arose on the Bill. In regard to what the hon. Member had just said he would only say that delay sometimes gave opportunities for faction as well as for promoting conciliation. If, however, they found that any further extension of time was really likely to bring about a settlement he was sure that many hon. Members would not allow personal considerations in regard to the assembling of Parliament to stand in the way. He wanted on another point to make an appeal to the Government. As the time-table stood in the White Paper it appeared that Clauses 10, 11, and 12, and the new clauses, were to be disposed of in half a day, and as adumbrated in the Resolution before the House that half a day would be next Saturday, so that all these would have to be disposed of in a short time. The Prime Minister had indicated his willingness to meet an appeal with regard to the new clauses, but he would like to put in a word as to the extreme importance of there being some appreciable time for discussing Clause 10. This was the only clause which dealt with financial supervision other than those which dealt with the contracting-out schools. A considerable number of persons, although interested in the religious controversy, were yet sufficiently mundane to realise that a great deal depended upon the financial provision made for local authority schools. The provisions of the Bill which he cordially supported, would involve greater expenditure upon local authorities, and they had no provisions in the Bill, but were referred instead to financial provisions which his right hon. friend the First Lord of the Admiralty issued as long ago as last spring. It was only on Clause 10 that the financial question could be raised, and they attached supreme importance to obtaining certain modifications and were anxious when this clause came up for discussion to put before the House and the Government as practical administrators of the Act their case for the modification they asked and the financial provisions as a whole. He therefore, appealed to the President of the Board of Education to secure that in the enlarged time-table there was at least half one Parliamentary day given to Clauses 10, 11 and 12. Clauses 11 and 12 were comparatively unimportant, but Clause 10 was a clause of great importance.

*MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has treated this question as if an extra half a day one way or the other will settle the question. But the matter is far too serious for anything of that sort, and therefore, although an extra half day will give room for half a day's extra speaking, we are in this strange position—a position such as in thirty years Parliamentary experience I have never known. It is a constitutional question which we are discussing. For 700 years this House has gone on. Its first object often has not been legislation, but to require for the Commons of this country full, free, and unfettered discussion. There has always been free, full, and unfettered discussion up to the last three years or so. So jealous has Parliament been of this privilege that it has refused to deal with the abuse of it, refused to deal with limitations or anything that has even a chance of limiting our discussions. It has been always held that it is better to put up with the abuses than to do anything that would impair the right of discussion itself. For the past three years that has been altered. Instead of legislating by discussion we have legislated by the machinery of closure and the guillotine. It is said that that existed before three years ago, but before three years ago the closure and guillotine were rare incidents in our discussions, used as a last resource to put an end to obstruction and undue opposition. Now it has become the rule. Why do not the Government meet Parliament with a programme, and say: "We in the Cabinet have decided what is to be passed, and we will take each of the measures without any discussion at all, and pass them into law, so far as this House is concerned, by the closure." That would be legislation by the Cabinet. The result would be practically the same as this smothering of discussion. There will, however, be no time saved. The right hon. Gentleman has brought forward this measure after settling and arranging with certain parties outside, one of whom, the Archbishop, is non-representative of the people. But did the right hon. Gentleman consult hon. Members who sat in Opposition and in other parts of the House, who represent large constituencies whose interests are to be dealt with in the manner proposed by the Bill? I believe not. They are to be faced with the preconcerted plan settled by arrangements with others outside. These arrangements are not completed, and from that point of view the Bill itself is introduced prematurely, and so we had this enormous question forced through its Second Reading with what I might call a burlesque of discussion—a proceeding which it was a farce to call a discussion. Now it is proposed to pass it through its Committee stage, and having regard to the number of points, clauses and questions which have to be settled, with practically no discussion at all. I do not value the two extra days that have been given in order that there might be a little more discussion. Judging by what is due to the country and to the House, and judging by the traditions of this House, I say that to talk about eight days for the Committee stage of this Bill is an insult to the Constitution and to the constituencies of the country, and instead of this Bill achieving the peace which we are told it will, it will bring war. We should have had time to thrash out this question thoroughly in Committee—not taking eight days, but such time as was necessary thoroughly to thrash it out—there might then have been some prospect of a settlement. But though we may be denied the opportunity of thrashing it out here, no one can prevent the question being well discussed in the country, and that is what will be done. If the Government force this Bill through without debate here, then the discussion will be taken up in the constituencies and then it will be too late. There is another important view which I would like to bring to the notice of my right hon. friend opposite and of the House. That which has distinguished this House of Commons and honourably distinguished its proceedings from the proceedings of every other legislative assembly in the world is that in this country there has always been continuity of legislation. What is passed by one Government is not upset by another, although that other Government may have been of different complexion. That continuity of legislation is due to the fact that hitherto every important measure that has been passed in this House has been thoroughly discussed to its extreme limits and was the deliberate outcome of prolonged discussion and argument, and once settled, it was settled for ever. That continuity has been destroyed by the action of the Government in forcing legislation through this House by means not of discussion but of machinery. It is a fact that you are destroying this great constitutional practice and this most beneficent result of full, free, and unfettered discussion. I am not going to discuss the rights or wrongs of various demands for different in the House, either of the Church, Roman Catholics, or Nonconformists. Their demands may be right or they may be wrong, but in any case they have a right to place them before the House and to discuss them to their fullest extent. I am not personally concerned in the claims of the various churches, but I will take this opportunity of saying that I and many others have good cause to be thankful for the action of the churches before 1870, without which many of us would have had no education at all. When we talk of these matters and of the work done for our fathers and forefathers, I would ask hon. Gentlemen representing the Labour Party where they would have been but for the voluntary schools, which opened their doors for the education of the poor? Why should you destroy those voluntary schools without letting them have a full chance of pleading their cause, and giving them full recognition of the debt of gratitude which is due to them as institutions which were the means of education to the poor at a time when there was no other provision for them? The Prime Minister has agreed to give other two days, but if you give other four, six, or any number of days, I for one shall not be satisfied with anything less than a full discussion of every grievance from whatever quarter it comes, in connection with this Bill. Those who call themselves democrats and claim to represent Labour, when they join in a vote which disposes of the liberties of the people as represented in this House, do not in reality represent the real democracy. This country is imbued with a love of full and free discussion, whether inside or outside of the House, and it will resent any attempt to interfere with it, especially in an assembly where free discussion has always been regarded as the greatest privilege and the greatest safeguard of the liberties of the people. My hon. friend the Member for Worcestershire who spoke just now advanced a plea. What was it? What was his reason for voting for this curtailment of free discussion? He said it was the only way to silence the minority. That was the keynote of his speech.

MR. J. W. WILSON said that what he had contended was that the only way open to them was either to apply the closure or suspend the eleven o'clock rule and sit on. But many objected to sitting into late hours, though personally he was quite ready to sit up all night instead of having the closure.

*MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I misunderstood the position of the hon. Gentleman. I thought his position was that the only way to deal with the matter was to silence the majority. In that it appears I was mistaken. But I want to add another reason in support of the claim that we ought to have a wider discussion. I am one of the founders of the old National Education League, which was established in the sixties. Our programme was for compulsory education, and what was called the secular school. The secularists have got a bad name since those days. The case with which we were dealing then was different from that which we are now considering. We held that the secular school was the only solution. But full discussion reveals other possible alternatives, and I must confess that when we stood on the secular platform in Birmingham we were absolutely defeated by the people who, rightly or wrongly, decided that they would have some form of religious teaching in the public elementary schools. So, in this instance, if you could continue to discuss matters long enough—and the end would justify any length of discussion—they would then find whether there was any alternative to this co-called secular school; they would then see public opinion coming nearer or going further away from the principle, for it is a principle, that in our schools the State should have nothing to do with religious teaching. But that discussion is denied to us here, and the question will have to be thrashed out in the constituencies. If this Bill becomes law through lack of discussion it will be the beginning of a theological strife of such bitterness and of such wide extent as to make the strife experienced in past years quite small in comparison. Bear in mind that there has never been any difficulty with the parents, and there never has been any difficulty with the children anywhere. The difficulty lies with the militant religious sections. You tender them this agreement, and when this

Mr. Jesse Collings.

Bill becomes law they will make their churches and chapels and meeting-places arenas of an opposition so vigorous that it will out-do all that has gone before. I know that it is useless to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, and therefore we must trust to getting a discussion in the only place we have left in the Parliamentary institution of this country. Discussion in this House is denied to us, and we must trust to getting it in another place. I for one, like many others around me and in the country, never thought that the day would come when we would have to say: "Thank God we have a House of Lords."

*SIR PHILIP MAGNUS (London University) said that most Members on that side of the House would agree with what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. He thought that those who were genuinely desirous that a settlement of this so-called difficulty should take place must feel that such a settlement was absolutely impossible unless sufficient time was given to Members of the House to discuss thoroughly and fully the new and somewhat complicated measure which had only recently been placed in their hands. There could be no doubt whatever that there was a consensus of opinion among all parties in that House that a settlement of this question was eminently desirable, and personally he had shown that he fell in with those who held this view, as he thought nearly all did, by the vote he gave last night. At the same time he felt that it would be impossible for him and others who felt with him, to vote for the Third Reading of this Bill unless certain alterations were made in some of its clauses and unless sufficient time was given to enable the House thoroughly and properly to discuss it. In some of the rather lachrymose speeches which had been delivered in the course of the debate that day they had heard a great deal about the strife and contention that had been going on for the last twelve years in connection with religious teaching. The hon. Member opposite representing a Welsh constituency in the very eloquent speech which he delivered last night referred to the fact, or the alleged fact, that, in consequence of this strife and contention, no educational progress had been made during those twelve years. That statement was almost similar to one which fell from the Prime Minister when he was speaking on this subject. From his own experience he wanted emphatically to deny that statement. It was quite true that on the platforms and in the House of Commons there had been shown great differences of opinion, which had led people to think that there was strife going on all through the country on this religious question, but he must emphatically state that these differences had not been experienced in the schools, and the agitation was fortunately outside our educational institutions. Perhaps it was partly for that reason that the country had made during the last twelve years enormous progress in, he believed, every branch of education. That being the case, of course, this settlement did not appear to him to be so urgent as it might seem to other Members, and he should have very much have preferred it if the adequate discussion of the subject and the further consideration of the Bill could have been left over to the commencement of another session. He could not, for his own part, see the need for this great hurry and haste in the settlement of the question, and he believed that they would come to the discussion very much better prepared to make compromises and to arrive at a conclusion which would be generally acceptable if they had time carefully to think over what the Bill really meant, not only from the religious but from the educational standpoint. He believed that very few persons could have had time sufficiently to consider the Bill, or to know what its effect might be upon other schools, and he should have welcomed the opportunity which would have been open to them, if the Bill had stood over until the commencement of next session, for giving it thorough and careful consideration. He could quite understand the desire on the part of the Government to accelerate the passage of the Bill. They had been told over and over again that everybody was tired of the controversy. It was pointed out by his hon. friend the Member for Glasgow University that, although

no reason why, when the matter had to be considered, they should arrive at a conclusion hastily. Further than that, it seemed to him very dangerous indeed to endeavour to settle an important question in that House not only when those who were most capable of giving an opinion on the subject were tired of the whole question at the fag-end of the session, but when they were nearly all worn out and he believed incapable of putting into its consideration that amount of intelligence which an important question of this kind really required. Not only was the Bill not to be carried over to the beginning of another session, for he understood that to be the decision, but the time to be given to the discussion of its various clauses was so limited that it was almost impossible to deal with them in the manner in which they ought to be dealt with. It was very desirable indeed that they should have an opportunity of hearing what the teachers of the different kinds of schools had to say as to the practicability of many of the clauses and of their bearing on the general arrangements of the schools. No opportunity of that kind was given. They had no opportunity, as many of them would like to have had, of discussing these questions with the various associations of teachers, which were constituted for the very purpose of considering questions of this character. On the contrary, they were called upon hastily and hurriedly to put down ill-digested Amendments which possibly ought not to be put down because they had not had time properly to consider what Amendments ought to be put down to a measure of this kind. He was sure that no one attached greater importance to a careful consideration of this kind than the President of the Board of Education, and he would appeal to him even at that late hour to confer with his colleagues as to the possibility of postponing the consideration of the measure until the beginning of next year. He believed that the Government would lose nothing by it. He was quite certain that education would gain by it. He believed that if such a postponement were possible, there would be more chance not only of a compromise but of a permanent settlement of this important question, which would prevent its being raised in any form for at least some twenty or thirty years to come.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover): I wish to explain in a very few words my reason for opposing the Motion of the Government. I feel the more bound to do since, whilst I duly recognise the concession of two days to be made by the Prime Minister, that concession does not affect or modify either of the two grounds upon which my opposition to the Motion is based. I understand that the Government have taken the course of moving this closure by compartments Resolution, on the morrow of the Second Reading of the Bill, in order that Parliament may be prorogued before Christmas instead of adjourning over Christmas. I recognise that that would be a matter of convenience to Members in whatever quarter of the House they sit, but we should purchase that convenience at too dear a price. It will involve the loss of two things which we shall live to deplore. The first thing that we shall lose, by hurrying this Bill through, is the chance of a lasting settlement based upon a mutual understanding of our respective positions. I am talking to the Members of this House. I am well aware that outside of this House there are many persons of the greatest eminence who are deservedly revered and who have come, or very nearly come to something approaching, though not reaching, an understanding. But that will prove of no avail to procure a lasting settlement unless the various sections in this House are also allowed to arrive at a mutual understanding of their respective positions. Anyone who has listened to the debate, whatever his personal view may be, must see that a different interpretation is placed in three or four quarters of the House on the approximate understanding which has been reached outside. Not a single Member has touched upon what we call contracting out without expressing regret at seeing it in the scheme of the Government Bill. It does not touch the religious question at all. It is a question of school efficiency. Everyone will admit that it goes back to the principle of conduct, and from the point of view of school efficiency our not to take effect until every section of the House has weighed in the balance whether or not we ought to incur that loss. As for what action we ought to take, it is not a question only for our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen—and in this connection I may point out the irony of the situation in which we find ourselves. Only a few days ago, the House, by a great majority, expressed its wish to relieve our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens from certain disabilities which were largely sentimental in their character. Within three days of our expressing our goodwill towards our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen we are going to relegate them to a position far worse than that from which we wished to relieve them. There are religious difficulties in connection with the Navy and the Army. You cannot always have a captain of a ship who is able to minister to all the spiritual needs of the whole ship's company, but what you are saying here is: "We are sorry that that is so, but that being so all the Roman Catholics are to go on board a cheaper class of ironclad, and in addition pay something towards its cost. We cannot decide in one week on the question of contracting-out, apart from its religious aspect, and thus we are compelled by the Government to reinsert contracting out." The financial burdens of the local authorities will be enormously increased and the taxpayer will have to find the money for a large Parliamentary grant. I hear from the Prime Minister that the Schedule is to be revised for the purpose of giving a larger grant. That will place one large burden on the taxpayer and at the same time you have to provide for another burden which will be placed upon the ratepayer, because where there are contracting-out schools parents may demand that an undenominational school shall be erected at the cost of the ratepayer. In view of the present financial situation we ought not to rush through a measure which is going to put a further burden on the ratepayers and taxpayers of the country. How perfectly futile these precautions become when a few lines in italics, including so many matters of great educational and religious importance, are rushed through undebated at the completion of one day. Both these disabilities, namely, that we get a worse secular form of education under this Bill and put an unnecessary burden on the taxpayer and the ratepayer, arise from the fact that there has been no attempt at uniformity. It is because the Government have chosen to build their plans on a principle which is theoretically unfair that they are driven as the necessary corollary, both to contracting out and these extra financial burdens. How can we deal with these clauses under compartment Resolutions? How can we deal with the relation of the religious part of the Bill to the other parts of the Bill on this basis of theoretical unfairness? Any man who has a grievance can easily raise popular feeling; he can point to such and such a thing as unfair and appeal to an audience of his countrymen. Englishmen greatly believe in the principles of fairness, and every audience he appeals to will support him if he can show that the thing of which he complains is unfair. The result of rushing this Bill through will not be to get a lasting settlement. It will merely be to set up a sorry target for all those who are not in agreement with it to fire at. By insisting on proroguing Parliament before Christmas we shall lose the chance of settling this question. If we pass this Motion of the Government we shall lose the right of the House of Commons to the place it ought to enjoy in the councils of the State. All we have to do then is to see that the Bill is carried. Our place in the councils of the nation will be less than that of those many eminent persons previously consulted by the Cabinet on this matter. We recognise in these days, when the State is taking to itself many functions previously left to the general public, that power is thrown more and more on the Cabinet and Committees of the Cabinet. But if the Cabinet are to decide with people Parliament extend the after all, of the people no such Motion formed part only very accepted. It has grown, however, to be the normal procedure of the present Government, but still we may say that, though it is the normal procedure, some exceptions should be made to it, and if any exceptions should be made surely it is in regard to a Bill that is utterly valueless unless it is an agreed Bill, agreed between all parties of the House.

MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central) did not think that the Prime Minister quite appreciated the nature of the complaint they made. It was not so much that the time allotted was insufficient, but that neither they nor those they represented or were associated with had breathing space to understand what the provisions of the Bill were or whether it provided a basis of settlement. Their contention was—and no extension of time allotted would remove it—that if they took a Bill like this and stuck to it de die in diem no good result could be obtained. The Act of 1902 was brought in in March after negotiations with all sorts of persons had been going on since the October previous. The Second Reading took place in May and the Committee in the following July, and thirty days were taken on that Bill before the closure was moved. Altogether seventy days were taken on that Bill, and his right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition got through all the really contentious portions of the Bill without any other than the closure possible under the ordinary rules. He was speaking from memory. He had also tried to find out in the short time at his disposal what was the time taken in passing the Act of 1870, which had achieved a settlement for thirty years. The preparation for that Bill began in 1869. The memorandum was submitted on 21st October, 1869, to the Cabinet which discussed the lines on which the Bill should go. The Cabinet decided that a Bill on those lines should be printed on 24th November. It did not pass through the Cabinet until 4th February, 1870, and was introduced on 8th February. On its introduction there were only two opponents to it, yet five weeks were allowed to elapse before the Second Reading. Its Second Reading passed without a division, which clearly showed it to be an agreed Bill. A good three months elapsed before the Bill went to the Committee stage, and all parties had full opportunity of looking at its chief points. At that time the Liberal Government was all powerful. It had come in on a new franchise, was possessed of greater moral power than any Parliament of the last century. The Bill came on for Committee in June, and many drastic changes took place. The Committee stage lasted fifteen days and there were five days on Report. There were two days on the Third Reading, which was passed on 22nd July, 1870. When they considered that the Bill now before the House was just as important as the Act of 1870 and aroused passions probably far greater than those aroused in 1870, he submitted that it was perfectly impossible either to describe this Bill in any sense as an agreed Bill or to discuss the details in the time given so as to ensure a permanent and lasting settlement. After noting some of the problems involved in the first three clauses of the Bill, he said he did not profess to say that no settlement was possible, either on these or on other lines, which would meet the wishes of those who admittedly could not conform to the normal type of school. But if they had to engage in the discussion of these matters without previous deliberation, an agreement would not be possible, and the whole settlement proposed by the Bill would be defeated at the start. If the Government had devoted their attention to a Bill of this sort earlier in the year there might have been a better chance of an accommodation. But this time last year they announced their intention to bring in a measure that should be short, sharp, and drastic, and that intention was entirely fulfilled by the Bill they subsequently introduced. That Bill vitiated all educational progress down to the moment, less than ten days ago, when its withdrawal was announced. If it were the intention of the Government to arrive at a settlement, he implored them not to press this Motion, but to allow ample breathing space to all those parties whose dearest interests were involved, and to give them time to consider their position. If the Prime Minister went on, not only could there be no settlement, but a new wrong would be created far exceeding in bitterness and intensity any grievances which they could have felt under the provisions of the present law.

MR. HART-DAVIES (Hackney, N.) said there seemed to be a universal feeling on the part of the House that rather more time than the Prime Minister had allowed ought to be given to this measure. His right hon. friend had so far admitted that complaint that he had extended the time for the Committee stage by a couple of days. That could hardly be regarded as quite satisfactory. This was an enormously important matter, and could hardly be discussed in a proper fashion in the time allotted. He had never been able to make out why Bills were not carried over to the following session. He felt that if this Bill went through its primary stages before Christmas it was a Bill which might be very well carried over to next session. Of course, the big difficulty was the Christmas holidays. They were entitled to a certain amount of holidays. For two years hon. Members had been sitting in the House all the year round, and they were not so much in touch with their constituencies as they ought to be. The Education Bill was a measure in regard to which hon. Members ought to go to their constituents and try to find out the views of Churchmen and Nonconformists alike. He thought it would be disastrous if Members had to tell their constituents that the Bill had been forced through at a rapid rate. He hoped the Government would give more time to the measure, and suggested that they could do so by carrying it forward to next session, as he understood they intended to do in the case of the Irish Land Bill.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) congratulated the Government on the great skill with which the Prime Minister conducted his Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman made use of a familiar device by naming a time which was obviously and patently absurd, and then, with a great show of moderation and fairness, extending it. It was really absurd to compel the House to discuss the Bill in Committee, even in the period so extended. The Prime Minister's assertion that there was nothing new in the Bill was not borne out by the facts. There were at least three propositions in it which were entirely novel—universal compulsory Cowper-Temple teaching, the right of entry to all schools, and contracting-out on a large scale—which, though they had received some discussion, had never been fully discussed, and had never before been proposed by a responsible Government as a solution of the problem. The House, therefore, had to deal with a Bill which was really novel in many respects and was far-reaching in its consequences. Ministerial supporters said that it was practically an agreed measure; but he would remind them that 157 Members went into the lobby against it on the Motion for its Second Reading. That was a very much larger number than usually voted in this Parliament against the Government, and an enormous majority of those who so voted were actuated by the strongest possible feeling, compared with which ordinary political convictions were trifles light as air. It was absurd, ridiculous, and even untrue to say that this was almost an agreed Bill. What reason was there for saying that it must be got through this session? Why should not the Bill be brought forward next session, its First and Second Readings taken on one day as there was precedent for doing, and then its consideration in Committee calmly proceeded with? He asked hon. Members on the Ministerial side to consider carefully the nature of the precedent which they were setting up. Here was a Bill, novel, complicated, bitterly opposed on the strength of the most conscientious and profound convictions, and it was to be carried through the House within three weeks, at the outside, from the time of its First Reading. He would probably have no opportunity of sitting on the Treasury bench, and, therefore, would not have the gloomy satisfaction of treating hon. Gentlemen opposite as badly as they were now treating the present Opposition, but some of his friends might have that melancholy satisfaction. He could conceive a novel Budget imposing a fiscal revolution on the country, a Budget which would be open to great misconstruction in the country. What a valuable precedent there would be for that in this Bill. What was to prevent such a Budget being passed through all its stages in three weeks? And in that case there would be no opportunity of revision by the other House, so that hon. Members opposite would be in an even worse case than was the present Opposition. Were they going by their votes to make such a thing possible?

MR. MALLET (Plymouth) asked if the noble Lord really suggested that that was a course which his political friends were likely to pursue.

LORD R. CECIL replied that he was not sufficiently in their confidence to know, but he would find it exceedingly difficult to condemn them if they took it. He saw no distinction in principle between the proceedings that afternoon and the hypothetical case which he had laid before the House. There was more than a chance, there was a practical certainty, that any ordinary Government Bill would be opposed, and that the Opposition would use all the forms of the House to defeat it; but was there any probability of that in this case? Opposition to the measure came from all quarters of the House. It was essential that a proposition of this kind should be carried out without anything approaching obstruction, as the feelings of all the various sections of the Opposition had to be considered, and the old wholesome rule that used to exist in the House when there was a genuine, corporate self-respect would for a time be restored. Therefore, so far as what was called obstruction was concerned there was not the slightest need for the guillotine. The real reason was that the Government were afraid that if the measure was properly considered and discussed it would be rejected. What possible opportunity had this democratic Parliament given to the people of the country to consider the provisions of the Bill? Not a thousandth part of them realised what they were. By the time the Bill was through the House they would begin for the first time to understand what it was proposed to enact. To hope that procedure of that kind would lead to conciliation was simply insanity. He remembered that Newman reproached Dr. Pusey for discharging an olive branch as if from a catapult. The Government were discharging their olive branch from a 4.7 cannon. It was grotesque to imagine that anyone would accept an olive branch so tendered. So far from closing the controversy, it would merely open up a new and far more bitter chapter in the future.

MR. BYLES agreed with the main argument of the hon. Member for Sevenoaks that the Government should do everything possible to convince those with whom it was entering into alliance and give them as much time as was necessary to break down opposition. He hoped to rope in a good many of those Members who, as the noble Lord reminded the House, had voted against the Second Reading last night. The argument with regard to the length of time given to the discussion of this controversy in 1870 and 1902 did not impress him. This Bill was put forward as practically agreed upon by both sides—[Cries of "No"]—and should be regarded as one on which much opposition would not arise. Therefore much time would not be needed for the ratification of the agreement that had been come to. If the proposal to leave this matter over to next session were conceded by the Government, he would be very glad to agree to it. He would vote for the Amendment put forward by the hon. Member for Sevenoaks in order to express his intense desire that both parties should acquiesce in this general agreement. He maintained further that these repeated guillotine Motions were having the effect of destroying the virtue of Parliament. They were impairing the authority and sanction of its decisions and public respect for its enactments. He did not believe that it was the only way, as they were continually told, of getting measures through the House of Commons. This method was increasing the power of the Executive. That was a very dangerous power. If one of the new Members of the House could go back twenty years he would realise the liberties he had lost, what an unimportant item the private Member had become, and how much less powerful and influential were his remaining duties and privileges in the House than they were in those days. The Executive was one thing and the House of Commons was another, and he believed the House of Commons would one day, and he hoped it would not be long, reassert itself and determine to put an end for ever to this machine-like method of getting through great measures presented by the Government.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London): The observations of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down fell naturally and appropriately into two parts. He dealt with the special circumstances under which this Bill is brought forward. He was not unmindful of the general question that lies behind it—namely, the method in which this House has in the past conducted and is in the future to conduct its deliberations. Perhaps the House will permit me to say something on both those aspects of the question, partly in reply to the hon. Gentleman, and partly because I have a statement to make with regard to the more general question on my own behalf, and on behalf of those who sit on this Bench, which has a bearing upon our future proceedings. I begin with the particular aspect of this problem that relates to this Bill. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has repeated, not as a mere unusual statement, but with emphasis and with obvious conviction, that this is an agreed Bill.

MR. BYLES: I said that it was intended to be an agreed Bill, that it was put forward as an agreed Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member said that it was put forward as an agreed Bill. I will do the Government justice; I do not think that they have ever said the Bill is an agreed Bill. They could not have said that with the smallest regard to the plain and obvious verities of the situation. It is a Bill on which all of us hope, and some of us think, that you may ultimately get agreement, but it is not an agreed Bill, nor has it any of the characteristics which justify that epithet. It is certainly not an agreed Bill with any political party. It is certainly not an agreed Bill, as I understand it, with the great bulk of any religious community. It certainly is not even an agreed Bill, unless I am greatly mistaken, with the Archbishop of Canterbury and those

Members of the episcopal bench who have been most closely associated with him in these negotiations. If the hon. Gentleman will read the letter of the Bishop of London in this morning's paper, which was referred to by my hon. friend the Member for Sevenoaks when he proposed on behalf of the Opposition his Amendment, he will see how very far from the truth, even with regard to those who are working most closely with the Archbishop, is the statement that in their view it is an agreed Bill. As for the Archbishop himself, we know authentically nothing subsequent to the last letter which appeared in the truncated correspondence which is all that we have as passing between him and the Government; and unless rumours are quite beside the mark—and very likely they are—even now the Archbishop is far from thinking that this is a Bill on which he and the Government are agreed. Perhaps, if I am wrong in that statement, the Minister for Education, who is alleged by his followers, though not by me, to have presented this Bill as an agreed Bill, will put me right when he rises to reply. This is a Bill which all of us hope, and some of us think, may be made the basis of agreement, but it is in no sense an agreed Bill, nor are the canons with regard to Parliamentary time, properly applicable to an agreed Bill, appropriate on this occasion. It is quite true, and it has constantly happened in the memory of old Parliamentary hands, that an agreement has been come to between the two sides of the House with regard to some measure, and the whole thing has been hurried through with extraordinary speed and with less than the amount of discussion which everybody would regard as proper, simply because it was an agreed Bill and everybody wanted to get to the end of it. That was a perfectly familiar Parliamentary proceeding. That is not the procedure appropriate to this occasion, nor the procedure the Government ought to pursue, if they want this Bill, when it gets to the Third Reading, to be a really agreed basis of a permanent compromise. The Government themselves have almost admitted that. The Prime Minister has made a concession for which, as it is a concession, grateful of course, in the two days to the time to compartments. It is a concession, but the Government will not think me ungracious if I say that it seems to me to be utterly inadequate to the real necessities of the situation, not merely the necessities of the discussion within the walls of this House, but the necessities of the discussion within the walls of this House in their relation to the public opinion of the country. After all I never desired or asked that this House should reflect from day to day the changing moods of the constituencies outside. I quite think that this House should have an opinion of its own, reflecting no doubt, so far as it can, the ultimate views of the people, but based upon that knowledge which we have and which the community outside cannot have in the same measure or degree, and the mere fact that there may be a feeling against a measure in the country is not an adequate reason for our entirely changing our policy on any particular question. But, while granting that as a fundamental axiom of Parliamentary government, have not I got every man who is listening to me in agreement with me when I say that we cannot have adequate discussion of a complicated measure touching closely interests, prejudices if you will, convictions of every class in every part of the community, unless we know how our proposals and the proposals of the Government strike those who are most nearly and immediately affected? Does anybody doubt that? If they do not doubt that proposition, may I ask whether anybody can put his hand on his heart and say that in his opinion, the Nonconformist opinion, the Church opinion, the educational layman's opinion in all parts of the country, is so seised of the details of this measure and is so adequately informed as to the effect that it will have in his particular district and on his particular interests, that we can come to the discussion of the Government proposals adequately equipped to deal with the complex problems which are brought before us? Several Gentlemen on the other side have expressed the same views as I do. My hon. friend near me speaking for the Opposition bench and my two right hon. friends the Member for Dover and the Member for Worcestershire, who have also spoken, while holding different views as to the possibility of making this Bill into the desired compromise, are absolutely at one in their view that the only shadow or glimmer of hope which exists for obtaining that most desirable end is to give not merely this House, but the country, on which this House ultimately depends, some opportunity of forming a considered judgment on the Government proposals. There is one more point, before leaving that branch of the subject which I think has not been touched upon. I do not think it is possible for any Government or any draftsmen to cook up with sufficient rapidity a really watertight Bill in the time which has been given to this Government to do it. Remember the Parliamentary strain under which we have been living these last two years. I have some knowledge of the inside working of Governmental business. I know the pressure upon all Ministers of the Crown, not merely the Prime Minister, who is, I understand, largely responsible for this work. The body of draftsmen at the command of the Government have been engaged in I do not know how many measures, all complicated, and all difficult to prepare in a hurry. I do not believe it is possible for the Government to have produced in this measure their own scheme in the best shape in which it ought to be presented to the House, and when we come to examine it, in order to carry out the very scheme of the Government, we shall not be able to avoid important Amendments. That is an additional reason for giving the House of Commons time to do that which I am sure the Government have not had time to do.

Now I have something to say to the House on a point touched upon by the last speaker—namely, the relationship which closure by compartment Resolutions have had in the past, are now having, and will have in the future upon the practice of this legislative body. I suppose during the last three years I have made speeches upon every one of the guillotine Resolutions which the present Government have brought forward, and in the course of those speeches I have, no doubt, wearied the House with some descriptions of the history of these Motions. But, as this is very likely the last speech which I shall ever make upon this subject, may I recapitulate that history? The history of closure by compartments goes back twenty-one years. The first closure by compartment Resolution was made on the Criminal Law (Ireland) Amendment Bill—generally called the Crimes Act—of which I was in charge. That Bill was fought in a manner to which this present Parliament is an absolute stranger. We fought night after night, sitting continuously from four in the afternoon till four the next morning. We were sixteen days in Committee before the Government was driven, rightly or wrongly, to resort to the expedient which we now so light-heartedly and so frequently adopt. That Crimes Act was, in the opinion of the Government, an absolute and pressing necessity from the point of view of public safety. We endured sixteen days of discussion—not ending at 11 o'clock, but going on until mere physical exhaustion reduced us all to silence—before resorting to closure by compartment. We had to follow the example in regard to the appointment of the Parnell Special Commission, which created great controversy. The next case of closure by compartment was the Home Rule Bill of 1893. The Government of 1893 allowed the Opposition to discuss that Bill for twenty-eight days before they thought the position had become intolerable, from their point of view. There were these three cases between 1887 and 1893. The same Government brought forward in 1894 the Evicted Tenants (Ireland) Bill, which they regarded as a matter dealing with the immediate safety of law and order in Ireland. Up to the general election of 1895 there were only four cases of closure by compartment, two of them under the Unionist Government, two of them under the Radical Government. Then came the long term of office of the Unionist Party, beginning in 1895 and 1896, and ending in the last weeks of 1905. In those ten years closure by compartment was applied only three times. First there was the Education Act of 1902. That measure lasted forty-five days altogether, and thirty-eight days were spent in Committee before the closure was applied. All great controversial points in that Bill were discussed over and over again in Committee before the closure by compartment was applied. The other two occasions were the Licensing Bill of 1904 and the Aliens Bill of 1905. On the slender basis of these three cases in ten years we have been denounced in this House and in the country as a Government and a party grossly neglectful of the liberties of Parliament, anxious on all occasions to "gag" legitimate debate, and as desirous of accumulating in our own administrative hands all the powers which ought to have been shared with this deliberate Assembly. Then, on the strength of that charge, in language which it is not worth while reviving, although it was admirable from the point of view of eloquence by hon. Gentlemen now sitting on the Treasury benches, the party opposite, vowed to Parliamentary liberties, the party who, by their criticisms, committed themselves to the view that resorting to closure by compartment three times in ten years was "gross neglect of the liberties of Parliament," came into power with an absolutely overwhelming majority. How have they given evidence to the country of their practical belief in these theoretical professions? Since they met in the plenitude of their power, and all the early enthusiasms of a young Parliament, with their large majority at their back, they have adopted closure by compartment no less than eleven times. This is the eleventh occasion within three years on which the leader of the House has asked the House to divest itself of all its traditional liberties, and that before any proof had been given that those liberties were going to be abused. If hon. Gentleman desire me to give these eleven cases I will tell them. [Cries of "No," "Agreed," and an HON. MEMBER: You have said you want time.] The eleven occasions are—The Education Bill, the Plural Voting Bill, the Territorial Forces Bill, the Evic'

Tenants' Bill, the Small Landowners Bill, the Small Holdings Bill, the Small Landowners (No. 2) Bill, the Land Values Bill, the Old-Age Pensions Bill, the Licensing Bill, and now this Education Bill. I have given the House this brief history because I want them to understand what is absolutely undeniable on the face of the facts, that what was an occasional expedient of the previous Administrations has now become an habitual method of conducting Parliamentary proceedings. I have, I believe, on every one of the preceding ten occasions on which this closure by compartment has been moved, explained that this constant practice was undermining and, indeed, destroying all our ancient rights and liberties. Unfortunately a minority small as we are are absolutely helpless, and all that we can do is to make an appeal as to what is the common interests of all sides. I have not made the appeal in any unreasonable form. I have not asked hon. Members to do what, of course, a party never will do, which is to go on each occasion into the lobby in great bodies against the Government which they are supporting. There may be occasional sporadic desertions by this or that hon. Gentleman, but even he would not vote against the Government if he thought it would lead to their defeat. And, therefore, I do not ask, and I have never asked anything so unreasonable as that hon. Gentlemen opposite should show their objection to a policy by clearing out the Government which they support. But there are perfectly well-known methods by which a party can clearly indicate to those whom it loyally follows that this or that course is one which they cannot long tolerate. It is not done openly by any public exhibition of disloyalty; it is done by that quiet impression of a view widely held (I do not care what the normal majority of that Government may be), and of which no Government can be either ignorant or neglectful. Everybody knows that these appeals have fallen upon deaf ears. I have consulted with my friends on this bench, and, speaking for them, I have to say that their deliberate decision is that these appeals can no longer be made. The time has come when it is really a farce for anybody on this bench to get up and in any reasoned speech to tell the House what is the inevitable goal towards which it is proceeding. My colleagues and I on this bench think that, after this experience, we have now, however reluctantly and however sorrowfully, to regard this closure by compartments as part of the settled practical procedure of the House. We have to look at facts as we find them, and I do not propose to make any further protest on this point. I shall henceforth regard closure by compartments as a thing to be voted against, like the suspension of the eleven o'clock rule, and shall simply walk into the lobby against them, but a reasoned argument on an appeal I shall no longer make from these benches. I shall regard it as a settled practice of this Government, and I shall, of course, preserve the rights of the successors of this Government, so far as I can speak for them, if they ever have successors; but in so far as we on these benches can lay down a statement in regard to the future of the party to which we belong, I say after three years bitter experience that this closing is the settled policy of the House of Commons; we will no longer pretend that guillotining is an exceptional measure, and whenever by the turn of fortune anybody who sits on this bench or behind me shall ultimately sit on that bench, if they find themselves in a position which makes it more convenient to use the weapon against which we have protested, but, alas! protested in vain, then, of course—and I say so quite openly, and who is going to say that I am wrong!—

Mr. A. J. Balfour.

Mr. BYLES: The right hon. Gentleman himself has been arguing all along that it is wrong.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I have not. If the hon. Gentleman would do me the honour to listen to an argument not very obscure he would see that what I have said is that, so long as this was not plainly a settled practice of the House, it was right and proper that I should do my best to make the House feel that if they allowed it to become a settled practice their ancient liberties were gone. When it is a settled practice of the House, let me tell the hon. Gentleman, it must not be a settled practice for one side of the House and not for the other. If that be admitted, I suppose we must regard this afternoon's debate as, if not a turning point, at all events a moment in our Parliamentary history at which a process which perhaps has gradually been coming on is finally settled and admitted. None of us can look such an event in the face without a feeling of deep regret. Old things have passed away. I do not now ask who is to blame for it. Whoever is to blame for it, if there is blame anywhere, it is with those who proposed the eleven closures in three years, and not with those who proposed it three times in ten years. All of us who have been in the House of Commons for the whole of our working lives must feel that when the events which have been moving slowly and at the last rapidly in this direction have finally reached a crisis in which the most strenuous advocate of Parliamentary liberties feels that the force of circumstances is too strong, that the new order has begun, and the old order has departed—we cannot come to such a moment without feelings of the profoundest regret and the deepest emotion. I do not deny that I am weary of making personal protestations, or that I vividly regard the future the task as so far a personal alleviation of the duties of the position I hold, but as a Member of Parliament, as one of this Assembly who, in Opposition and in the Government, has regarded the debates between the two sides as the most important, the most interesting as well as the most exacting part of a not easy life—as a Member of the House of Commons with these long memories behind me, I confess that I have made this speech with feelings of profoundest regret and with a feeling of the deepest disquietude for the future.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury): The House must be well aware that nothing would be more easy than to elaborate a tu quoque argument on this subject. I have no intention of quoting the right hon. Gentleman against himself, but the right hon. Gentleman himself, when he was responsible for the business of the House, resorted to the closure as a method of conducting business.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Three times in ten years.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): After twenty-six days in Committee.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I can only remark that if the application of the closure is an invasion of the rights and liberties of the House the right hon. Gentleman has himself been guilty of that invasion, and it, therefore, becomes a matter of arithmetical calculation as to which is the more guilty party. [An hon. Member on the OPPOSITION benches: Not a very difficult calculation.] I cannot imagine what use there is, throughout the whole of a Parliamentary afternoon, in throwing to and fro such accusations. Everyone admits that if opposition is organised against any great Bill in the House, it is almost impossible to get it through keep the whole business of Parliament delayed. But it is quite unnecessary for me to go into discussion on that subject now. I do not believe that this is a turning point in the history of the closure. Everybody knows that if the right hon. Gentleman returned to office he would return to closure; and I doubt whether any successors of the present Government would be able to get business through the House without some artificial allocation of time. I hope after the discussion we have had this afternoon that the House will be able to come to a conclusion on the Amendment. My right hon. friend beside me has suggested a concession to extend the time for consideration of the Bill in Committee by two days. I hope, Sir, the House will now come to a decision on the Amendment and allow us to carry out in accordance with Parliamentary usage the form which the Prime Minister has intimated that we are prepared to accept.

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS (Denbigh District) said he rose to support the Amendment on several grounds connected with the Bill. They had heard a good deal about negotiations, but, as he said a few days ago, there would not probably be a single Liberal Member who would have put these proposals before his constituency at the last election. At the last election the five or six millions of working-class parents of the children who went to elementary schools had an opportunity of making a pronouncement as to what they required done with regard to the education settlement. Something perfectly new and absolutely irreconcilable with what was then proposed was now submitted in the form of a compromise, and there had not been a single person communicated with who was the father of a child who would be affected by this legislation. The Government beyond question, when there was any special reference to questions affecting the Labour party usually communicated with that party, but on this question which affected the working classes of the country, for which that party pre-eminently stood, they had not called into negotiation a single representative. He said that for the Government to attempt to rush through these proposals, having an absolutely vital effect upon the future child life of the working classes of the country, without those working classes, either through their representatives or directly, having a real opportunity of examining into, or considering, or ascertaining precisely what would be the effect of those proposals, was an attempt to ignore the democratic principle upon which the Government professed to be elected. But there was another consideration. Unfortunately in connection with this proposal there had been such an unseemly scramble, not only on the part of members of the Government, but on the part of the Liberal Press, to get rid of the question that the criticisms which were really damaging to the character of the measure were not being fully put before the electors. Farther than that, the measure came at a particularly unfortunate time. This was an attempt to rush perfectly new proposals—absolutely and perfectly new proposals—[Cries of "No."] Hon. Members might say "No," but he said they were absolutely new proposals, and they came at a time not only when the Press was desirous of getting the question out of the way and were rendering magnificently loyal service to the Government in their attempt to secure that, but when unfortunately the public were not allowed to come into the Strangers Gallery and see what was being done. He therefore said, and he said it advisedly, that at this moment it was unfair to the great working-class population of the country, and to the great bulk of those people who had put the Government in power, that these proposals should be rushed, and he begged the Government for the sake of the future of Liberalism, of the people's schools, and of a real and permanent settlement, that an opportunity might be given for delay, to take the people of the country into their confidence, and to let Members of the House have an opportunity over the Christmas vacation of consulting their constituents, so that they might know exactly what was required. If that was not done, he should support the Amendment against the attempt of the Government to rush the Bill.

Mr. ASHLEY thought the Minister for Education entirely missed the point of his right hon. friend's argument. The right hon. Gentleman implied and admitted that there were undoubtedly occasions, there must be occasions, owing to the perfection to which obstruction had been brought on both sides of the House, on which the closure was necessary and justified; but it was a very different thing to apply the closure three times in ten years, as the late Government did after prolonged discussion in Committee, after every one of the main principles of the Bills had been discussed ad nauseam, and to propose to closure eleven Bills in two and a half years, and practically not to leave a single Bill without the application of the closure before any opportunity for obstruction, had it been intended, had occurred. He asked the House to cast its mind back to the Army Bill of last year. How could the Government have expected that there would be any organised obstruction to that Bill? It was a measure brought in by the Government to perfect our auxiliary forces, and although some Members on that side did not see eye to eye with the Government in the proposals they had made, yet the criticism was quite friendly and no organised opposition could have been anticipated and effected. And yet what did the Government do before they had opened their mouths to say one word about the Army Bill? A closure Motion was put down, and several of the most important parts of the provisions regarding our land forces were cut off from discussion. In this case similarly there were a great number of Members who disagreed with many provisions of the Bill, but he did not think there were a great number, or indeed any, who did not wish for a compromise on this burning question, if that compromise could be obtained on fair terms. He was sure that the Catholic community, who were a very strong and numerous body in his constituency, were perfectly willing to remain in the national system, they heartily desired to remain in it, if the Government would allow them, but if they were cast out adequate money should be given to them. There would be no opposition from below the gangway, nor upon his part as representing a large number of Catholics, if the Government would give them full time to discuss the question of single-school areas and the legitimate grievance of the Nonconformists when they only had a Church school in their area. But let the House consider—the right hon. Member for Sheffield had expatiated on it before—the ridiculously small amount of time given to discuss these important proposals. One day was to be given to the extinction of thousands of elementary schools all over the country. On the same day they had to decide what should be the State religion in those schools and the endowment of that State religion. Surely, however anxious they were to get this matter out of the way, they could not, with any sense of responsibility to those who sent them there, go and dispose of these things which vitally affected the interests of the country in so little space of time, taking into account the importance of the subject, and the right of the people to be heard about it in a day, to discuss it, and what was taken u to be the religious teacher or not. Surely these things ought to be given a great deal of discussion as they affected an enormous body of teachers. Then they were to discuss the most important question of the grounds on which the local education authority might refuse to give facilities at all. He said without fear of contradiction that none of the most important provisions would be discussed. It was proposed to take on the last day but one, subsection (5) of Clause 10. If they put aside for a moment the religious question, this was by far and away the most important clause that had been discussed in the present Parliament. It solemnly asked the House to put the Minister for Education above the law, and if it were passed the right hon. Gentleman would be able to do anything he liked. He was placed by it in a superior position to His Majesty, because, although the King was above the law, he was, through his Ministers, responsible to the law; but by this subsection the House was going to say that the Minister for Education could do anything he liked and not be called to account by anyone. It might be said that the Minister for Education would observe the law, but in reply to that suggestion he would only say that his predecessors in office had not. It was the Secretary to the Admiralty who had aided and abetted the school authorities in the West Riding to abolish the voluntary schools, which they did until the voluntary schools managers appealed to Mr. Justice Channell, who decided that the law must be obeyed, and that the Courts of Justice were the proper tribunals to enforce it. If the House were not to be able to discuss whether a Government Department should be placed above the law, then their discussion would become a perfect farce. On behalf of his constituents, he emphatically protested against only eight working days in Committee and two on Report being given to a measure which, in his opinion, was more important than any that had been discussed by this Parliament. In the two days on Report he had to put right all the mistakes in the Bill, and only one day was given to the Third Reading. He emphatically protested against the action of the Government.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Borough) said the hon. Member for Denbigh Boroughs was alone among the Members for Wales in the line which he had taken. There was no Member for Wales who did not know that the right of entry was odious to his constituents, and it was with a full sense of responsibility that they had decided to support the Bill. He hoped therefore that the Government would give as much time as they could to the discussion of the right of entry clause which must be fully considered if it was to meet with acceptance. He believed the Catholics had a strong claim and hoped that time would be given for consideration of the contract clauses. If the Government would give more time for the consideration of the Schedules and would increase the grant, they would improve the chances of effecting the compromise which he was anxious to see carried out.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 6, to leave out the word 'six,' and insert the word 'eight.'"—(Mr. Runciman.)

Question, "That the word 'six' stand part of the Question"—put and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the word 'eight' be there inserted."

SIR F. BANBURY asked the Government whether they would not agree to insert the word "ten" in place of "eight." He did not wish to take up the time of the House because he knew that the concession made by the Government was better than nothing, but as they had now agreed to make a concession, he appealed to them to carry it a little further and make it ten instead of eight days. In event of the Government accepting the Amendment he had drawn up a time-table which was much the same as that drawn up by the right hon. Gentleman, so that there would be no need to waste time in drawing up a new one. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment—

"To leave out the word 'eight,' and to insert the word 'ten.'"—(Sir F. Banbury.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'eight' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. ASQUITH: The hon. Baronet has been so moderate and persuasive that I certainly would have accepted his Amendment if I could have done so, but I cannot. I have made a considerable concession, and have with some difficulty readjusted the time-table as to meet the allocation of eight days for Committee. I may point out that it is absolutely necessary that we should get our time-table before five o'clock otherwise the alteration to eight instead of six days will be of no value.

LORD R. CECIL said he had not opposed the Amendment to leave out the word "six," but he would be compelled to vote against the insertion of the word "eight" because he had an Amendment on the Paper to insert the word "twelve."

Amendment to proposed Amendment negatived.

Question put, "That the word 'eight' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

New Table substituted.

Main Question, as amended, again proposed.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY pointed out that the House would be interested to know what the new table was. He thought that at least they should be told how the time was to be allocated before they were asked to decide the question.

MR. ASQUITH said that a copy of it had been supplied to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, but he would read it. The first day they would take Clause 1 and the Committee's discussion the financial Resolutions; the second, Clause 2; the third, Clause 2 up to 7.30 and the report of the financial Resolutions till 10.30; the fourth, Clause 3; the fifth, Clause 4 till 7.30 and Clause 5 till 10.30; the sixth, Clauses 6 and 7 till 7.30 and Clauses 8 and 9 till 10.30; the seventh, Clauses 10, 11, and 12 and the new clauses; and the eighth, the first schedule till 7.30 and the remaining schedules and any other matters till 10.30.

SIR WILLIAM BULL (Hammer-smith): Will it be taken de die in diem?

MR. ASQUITH: Yes.

MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD: Has any attempt been made to divide Clause 1?

MR. ASQUITH: No, Sir, but we have the whole of one day for it and till 7.30 on the next.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood): Will there be a Saturday sitting?

MR. ASQUITH: Yes, Sir, that is provided for.

LORD R. CECIL: Will there be a separate Saturday sitting for the Third Reading?

MR. ASQUITH: I do not wish to prejudge that unless the noble Lord wishes it.

Main Question, as amended, put.

The House divided:—Ayes, 192; Noes, 58. (Division List No. 419.)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir
 Frederick Banbury and Mr.
 Claude Hay.

Ordered, That the Committee stage, Report stage, and Third Reading of the Elementary Education (England and Wales) (No. 2) Bill, and the necessary stages of the Financial Resolution relating thereto, shall be proceeded with as follows:—1. Committee stage—Eight allotted days shall be given to the Committee stage of the Bill, including the necessary stages of the Financial Resolution relating to the Bill, and the proceedings on each of those allotted day shall be those shown in the second column of the table annexed to this Order, and those proceedings shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion at the time shown in the third column of that table. 2. Report stage—Two allotted days shall be given to the Report stage of the Bill, and the proceedings for each of those allotted days shall be such as may be hereafter determined in manner provided by this Order, and those proceedings, if not previously brought to a conclusion, shall be brought to a conclusion at 10.30 p.m. on each such allotted day. 3. Third Reading—One allotted day shall be given to the Third Reading of the Bill, and the proceedings thereon shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion at 10.30 p.m. on that day. On the conclusion of the Committee stage the Chairman shall report the Bill to the House without Question put, and the House shall on a subsequent day consider the proposals made by the Government for the allocation of the proceedings on the Report stage of the Bill. The proceedings on the consideration of those proposals may be entered on at any hour, though opposed, and shall not be interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to the Sittings of the House, but if they are not brought to a conclusion before the expiration of one hour after they have been commenced, Mr. Speaker shall, at the expiration of that time, bring them to a conclusion by putting the Question on the Motion proposed by the Government, after having put the Question, if necessary, on any Amendment or other Motion which has been already proposed from the Chair and not disposed of. After this Order comes into operation, any day shall be considered an allotted day for the purposes of this Order on which the Bill is put down as the first Order of the day, or on which any stage of the Financial Resolution relating thereto is put down as the first Order of the day, followed by the Bill. Provided that 5 p.m. shall be substituted for 10.30 p.m., and 2 p.m. for 7.30 p.m. as respects any allotted day which is a Friday, and 3 p.m. shall be substituted for 10.30 p.m. and 12 noon for 7.30 p.m. as respects any allotted day which is a Saturday, as the time at which proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion under the foregoing provisions. A Motion may be made by a Minister of the Crown at the commencement of business on any day that the House sit on the following Saturday at 10 a.m. for the purpose of the consideration of the Bill, and the Question on any Motion so made shall be put forthwith by the Speaker without Amendment or debate. Notice of any Question requiring an oral answer for a Friday or Saturday shall, if that day is an allotted day under this Order, be treated as a notice for the following Monday.

For the purpose of bringing to a conclusion any proceedings which are to be brought to a conclusion on an allotted day, and have not previously been brought to a conclusion, Mr. Speaker or the Chairman shall, at the time appointed under this Order for the conclusion of those proceedings, put forthwith the Question on any Amendment or Motion already proposed from the Chair, and shall next proceed successively to put forthwith the Question on any Amendments, new Clauses, or Schedules moved by the Government of which notice has been given, but no other Amendments, Clauses, or Schedules, and on any Question necessary to dispose of the business to be concluded, and in the case of Government Amendments or of Government new Clauses or Schedules he shall put only the Question that the Amendment be made or that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill as the case may be. A Motion may be made by the Government to leave out any Clause or consecutive Clauses of the Bill before the consideration of any Amendments to the Clause or Clauses in Committee. The Question on a Motion made by the Government to leave out any Clause or Clauses of the Bill shall be put forthwith by the Chairman or Speaker without debate. Any Private Business which is set down for consideration at 8.15 p.m. on any allotted day shall, instead of being taken on that day, as provided by the Standing Order "Time for taking Private Business," be taken after the conclusion of the proceedings on the Bill or under this Order for that day, and any Private Business so taken may be proceeded with, though opposed, notwithstanding any Standing Order relating to the Sittings of the House. On any day on which any proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion under this Order, proceedings for that purpose under this Order shall not be interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to the Sittings of the House. On an allotted day no dilatory Motion on the Bill, nor Motion to re-commit the Bill, nor Motion for adjournment under Standing Order 10, nor Motion to postpone a clause, shall be received unless moved by the Government, and the Question on such Motion shall be put forthwith without any debate. Nothing in this Order shall—(a) prevent any business which under this Order is to be concluded on an allotted day being proceeded with on any other day, or necessitate any allotted day or part of an allotted day being given to any such business if the business to be concluded has been otherwise disposed of; or (b) prevent any other business being proceeded with on any allotted day or part of an allotted day in accordance with the Standing Orders of the House after the business to be proceeded with or concluded under this Order on the allotted day or part of the allotted day has been disposed of.

SUNDAY LABOUR IN THE MERCANTILE MARINE.

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, I rise to call attention to the prevalence of Sunday labour in the mercantile marine in so far as it applies to British ships when lying in port both at home and abroad; and to move that, in the opinion of this House, the subject warrants consideration at the hands of His Majesty's Government with a view to measures being taken towards ensuring that those serving on British ships shall, so far as is reasonably possible, be relieved from work on the Sabbath Day.

The question of Sunday labour and the necessity of one day's rest in seven is by no means new to this House, but so far as I am aware, with the exception of a few words that I said on this subject early in the session, when I was calling the attention of the House to the Return issued by the Government on the treatment of their merchant seamen by foreign countries, it has never been discussed in its particular relation to those who serve in our premier industry, the British mercantile marine. Whilst I am in sympathy with those who are labouring so earnestly in the direction of imposing limitations on Sunday labour in so far as it effects certain occupations ashore, I think it a duty to attempt to focus special attention upon the position of our merchant seafarers, to so many of whom rest on the Sabbath day is a thing that is very seldom known.

My Lords, I do not seek for the amelioration of the seafarers' lot in respect to the Sabbath in any unreasonable way. Though many do not seem to see it, we cannot make regulations for seafarers in the same way as we can for any profession or occupation ashore. It is a service which demands special consideration, and legislation which can be applied with perfect ease ashore might, if applied to shipping, do incalculable harm to all concerned. In the case of British merchant ships exceptional circumstances are apt to arise in port where Sunday work can reasonably be expected of their crews. In the interests of shipowners I would certainly make provision for these exceptional occasions, but in the interests of seafarers I would, did the matter rest in my hands, make provision so that those who do this additional work should receive additional pay for it.

Then, again, when British ships are on the high seas it would be absurd to suggest that everybody should be allowed to abandon work on the Sabbath Day. The ship must get along; therefore duty must continue, although, so far as I can gather, shipmasters always reduce the work to its lowest possible limits on Sundays when at sea. Having said that I ask for nothing but what is reasonable, I can, with perfect truth, assure your

Lord Muskerry.

Lordships that Sunday labour on board merchant ships is rife, not only when they are lying in ports abroad but also in ports at home. Officers and seamen, particularly the officers, are worked to the utmost, and the blessing of one day's rest in seven is to them a rare privilege. I make no exceptions in classes or types of ships. In some of the biggest lines Sunday labour is just as common as Sunday labour in ships bearing the misnomer of "tramps." If it is not so when the ships are in ports at home, it is amply made up for when the ships go abroad.

In one of the biggest shipping lines in this country, whose headquarters are not 100 miles from this House, I may tell your Lordships that the ships always work on Sundays when in ports abroad. I will take another of our biggest lines, where a smart and promising young officer wrote, in a most courteous and reasonable way, to the directors of the company, pointing out what a very great physical strain it was on officers that they should be expected constantly to work on Sundays whilst the steamers were loading or discharging in Mediterranean ports. The response he got was that, on arrival home, he was requested to resign on the ground that he was not satisfied with the conditions of his employment. I would ask your Lordships whether we are right in tolerating this, and whether we should not protect our seafarers against such treatment? Have they no right to say anything on their own behalf? Take another big Atlantic Line. I am reliably informed that cargo is often worked on Sundays when the vessels are in a home port and also at ports abroad.

Coming to other firms, I find from the chief officer of a big steamer that—

"Sunday labour is the rule and not the exception at home and abroad. There is no recognition of Sunday, so far as loading or discharging is concerned."

Another officer says—

"The Eastern trade is a very hard one, day and night, Sundays included. No one ever knows what it is in his ship to have an hour off."

And he very rightly thinks that something to stop this state of affairs, so that an officer could get some time to himself, should be considered. Another officer says that abroad there is Sunday labour every Sunday if possible. During the last six months he has had eight Sundays in port, and worked on them all. I could quote you innumerable cases, but will content myself with giving you the opinions of one more gentleman following the sea. He is in command of a steamer and says—

“Sunday labour abroad, I fear, will never be properly done away with, for this reason. The shipowners of England encourage it by paying dispatch money—that is, to stevedores, who, out of that money, of course, pay extra to their men who are working on Sunday.”

He says that if Sunday labour were done away with, also the ways and means for saving Sunday at sea for owner's benefit, he is certain that seafarers would live longer and not have as many grey hairs in their heads,

I have in my possession the terms of a postscript appended to a letter of instructions which a certain large and well-known firm of shipowners forwarded to the master of one of their ships then lying in a port abroad. This postscript reads as follows—

“You should arrange to scrape the ship's bottom on Sunday so as not to interfere with the work on ordinary days. I hope you have thought of this and got it done.”

This emanates, not from any minor or unimportant shipping company, but from one which figures very prominently in shipping circles. I wonder what your Lordships think of this postscript. I ask: Are we going to permit such things to continue? Are we not going to do anything in lightening the lot of men who have such limited opportunities of speaking for themselves? Are we to allow officers and men, even under the broiling sun of West Africa, to be creatures of toil on Sunday just as on any other day?

Thanks to the Return which I was able to get from His Majesty's Government, shipowners cannot plead the stereotyped argument of contending against fierce foreign competition. From the Return I have mentioned, it is easy to see that most foreign maritime countries are far more solicitous about their seafarers than we are, even though we pride ourselves that the position is quite the opposite. Earlier in the session, when I was calling attention to this Return, I read to your Lordships extracts from it showing how the different foreign nations treated their sailors as far as regards Sunday work. I do not propose to take up time by again going through this, but in all the cases where there is absolute necessity for carrying on work on Sunday in every case the officers and crews receive extra remuneration. I think, my Lords, that anybody who studies the Return in question will realise that we are a long way behind other maritime countries so far as Sunday labour on board ship is concerned.

Apart from the Return, I can clearly put the position by relating the experiences of two gentlemen serving in different large steamers. One says—

“Re Sunday work; lying here (at Ibicuy) last Sunday we were working, although there is no hurry for her, as we do not leave here for Santos until the end of October. I asked the contractor, who is building the wharf, if he worked his men on Sundays. His reply was: ‘No, unless there is an English ship here, and then she pays all expenses.’ He also remarked that most foreign ships would not work on Sundays.”

The other gentleman, writing from an Italian port, gives his opinion in this way—

“I thought that I would inform you about the altered conditions that prevail in Italy re Sunday labour. There is no Sunday labour now on board vessels in this port, and I can also vouch for Genoa and Civita Vecchia. Our broker informs me that it now applies to all Italian ports. One would hardly credit that where these things can be, and are, stopped in other countries, they are allowed to go on unchecked under British rule. In Alexandria, last voyage, we worked both Sundays that we were there, as every other British vessel does, as it counts one half-day to the ship, providing they work a full day.”

I propose to trouble your Lordships but little more in regard to this serious matter. But I would emphasise the fact that under ordinary conditions when at sea our seamen and firemen must work twelve hours per day, Saturdays and Sundays included. In the great majority of cases our merchant officers must work, roughly speaking, some fifteen hours per day. Surely, then, when they do reach port and Sunday comes round they have an undeniable right to that rest and relaxation which they so richly deserve and most certainly require, and which at the present time they certainly do not get.

I am glad to say that there are some shipowning firms who set their faces against Sunday work on their ships. These firms deserve great praise, though I do not suppose they seek it. If only in justice to them, their colleagues should be forced to fall into line with them and be prevented from offering unscrupulous opposition both in the way of forcing their men to work on Sundays and in other despicable ways. It is no use appealing to conscience. Nothing will do it but compulsion, and that is why I hope this Motion will meet with the complete and unanimous approval of the House. It would be useless to introduce a Bill at the present time, but a consensus of opinion such as that which I now hope for would carry enormous weight, and would considerably facilitate our seeing the matter through to the end.

There are two aspects to the question. One is the religious aspect, which I will not dwell upon, simply because I think that when we urge the proper observance of the Sabbath we should, in the first place, demand that people should be given the opportunity of observing it properly. In the remarkable "Message to the Nation" which was issued not very long ago by the heads of the three Churches in this country I was very glad indeed to see that, whilst the proper observance of the Sabbath Day was very naturally dwelt upon, the physical necessity of one day's rest in seven was also fully recognised. At the recent International Congress on the Lord's Day held at Edinburgh, Mr. Moore, secretary of the Imperial Merchant Service Guild, speaking as the only representative of seafarers present, said—

"The amount of Sunday labour in the merchant service is a grave national scandal."

The Guild have especially brought this subject to my notice, and it is one which I can honestly say I have never more gladly taken up. It represents an evil which, sooner or later, must be eradicated. I can only commend my Motion for your earnest consideration, and should your Lordships see your way clear to give it your support, it would, I can fully assure you, be received with feelings of deep appreciation and gratitude by those who serve in the mercantile marine of our country.

Moved, "That the prevalence of Sunday labour in the mercantile marine, in so far as it relates to British ships when lying in port both at home and abroad, warrants consideration at the hands of His Majesty's Government with a view to measures being taken towards ensuring that those serving on British ships shall, so far as is reasonably possible, be relieved from work on the Sabbath Day."—(Lord Muskerry.)

THE EARL OF MAYO: My Lords, I am sure your Lordships will agree that the subject to which the noble Lord has called attention warrants consideration, not only at the hands of His Majesty's Government, but by everyone in this House. It largely depends, of course, on the way in which Sunday labour is construed. I have seen it on the West Coast of Africa, and the circumstances there make Sunday labour very often essential. But it is not universally essential. The noble Lord mentioned a great many cases, and we should like to have heard the names of some of the steamship companies concerned, especially the one which ordered the scraping of the ship on Sunday. I think it is perfectly outrageous to ask men who have been working all the week to set to work on Sunday and scrape the ship. Sunday labour is absolutely necessary in that part of the Empire to which I have referred. The Resolution, however, is worded in so mild a manner that there would be no harm in voting for it. We should like to hear what His Majesty's Government have to say on the matter.

THE EARL OF MEATH: My Lords, it is perfectly true, as Lord Mayo has said, that there are portions of the Empire where Sunday labour is necessary in regard to shipping; but, from personal knowledge, I know that the noble Lord who has brought forward this Motion is absolutely right when he says that there are large portions of the Empire, especially in the Mediterranean, where it is quite unnecessary that labour should go on on the Sunday. I hope that His Majesty's Government are going to answer the noble Lord in a sympathetic manner. It would be very remarkable if this country, which has always shown itself especially anxious that the Sabbath should be a day of rest, were to lag behind the rest of the world in this matter. I am no fanatic with regard to the observance of the Sunday. If it is necessary that work should go on, I say let it go on; but it is wrong for any body of employers to make their men work on Sunday when it is not necessary. First of all, there are a large number of men who object to Sunday work for honest religious reasons, and you have no right to force these men to work on the Sunday if they feel that it is contrary to their religious convictions. Then there is a very large number who feel that if they were on land they would not have to work on Sunday, and, therefore, they are aggrieved. This is not so much a grievance on the part of seamen, who often get extra pay; but the officers get no extra pay at all, and, from my own personal knowledge, work sometimes for fourteen and fifteen hours a day. Even in port they get no rest, and it stands to reason that if men are working always at high pressure they cannot be as capable of doing their duty as those who get a certain amount of rest. I believe myself that a good many accidents in connection with ships are due to overwork, and, therefore, from the utilitarian point of view, putting the religious view entirely outside, I hope that His Majesty's Government will give this question their serious attention.

*THE LORD BISHOP OF LIVERPOOL: My Lords, I do not intend to occupy your Lordships' time for more than a minute, but as I work in one of our largest seaports I desire, with all my heart, to support the Motion before the House. I do so on the ground that British seamen in port have just as much right to Sunday rest as we who work on land. I think it is a curious anomaly that nations which are supposed not to regard Sunday with any great degree of reverence should have safeguarded Sunday rest for their sailors, while we, who are supposed to be a Sunday-loving people, take no measures whatever to prevent, as far as is reasonably possible, those serving on British ships from working on Sunday. There is undoubtedly a grievance, and any Government that will take this case in hand will earn the gratitude of a class of men through whose craft we derive as a nation a great part of our wealth.

LORD LYVEDEN: My Lords, I should like to say, as regards the Motion moved by Lord Muskerry, that I fear it will not work at all smoothly. These things cannot be done by legislation, and should really be left to the discretion of the captains. Take, for instance, ships lying in open roadsteads like Jaffa. A ship may have to lie off there for several days owing to the weather. Suddenly a calm comes, and then, of course, it is a case of "all hands." It would be very hard if the day on which the calm came happened to be a Sunday and the officers and men refused to work owing to this legislation. I hope, therefore, my noble friend will not press the Motion, but will leave it to the discretion of the captains.

THE LORD BISHOP OF BANGOR: My Lords, I rise to give my support to Lord Muskerry's Motion. I do not think the noble Lord would deprecate men working on Sunday when it was necessary, such as in an open roadstead where it would be dangerous to lose any opportunity, or on the coast of Africa. But is it not something of a national scandal that in ports where there is no such necessity for Sunday work the men on British ships should be required to work whilst those on ships belonging to foreign Powers which do not profess to reverence the Sunday as we do abstain from work. In the Return to which Lord Muskerry has referred instances are given of that. I therefore hope your Lordships will accept the Motion.

LORD HAMILTON OF DALZELL: My Lords, I wish to commence what I have to say to-night by a sort of protest which I have had for some time in my mind. I do not know whether your Lordships have noticed that there is an extraordinary family likeness between the Notices of Motion which the noble Lord is in the habit of putting on the Paper. The general proposition which the noble Lord brings forward is always a very excellent one, but the particular application which he wishes to make of that principle is always difficult and very often impossible. The presence of those two features on these occasions places the noble Lord in a very enviable position, and it places the person who has to return the matter-of-fact official answer in rather a difficult one. I see that the noble Lord nods his head; he evidently appreciates that fact, and I can assure him that I do. What happens is that the noble Lord is able to pose as the champion of everything which is noble and ideal, and the official mouthpiece is made to appear as the advocate of all that is base and uncharitable. Your Lordships may have noticed that of late a third character has appeared in these scenes, in the shape of the noble Earl on the cross benches, whose role, if I may say so, is to rub in that particular aspect of the case.

THE EARL OF MEATH: Hear, hear.

LORD HAMILTON OF DALZELL: I do not really complain of that, because I suppose it is all part of the game, and that in time one will get accustomed to it. But I myself have invariably found that I am in agreement with the noble Lord on the general principle of his Motion. It is only when one comes to look into the matter more closely that one finds the enormous difficulty of applying it to the particular case brought forward. That has very frequently been so, and it is very much the case on this occasion. I am sure the Government and every Member of your Lordships' House would be willing to support any reasonable legislation for minimising Sunday labour, either ashore or afloat; but the difficulties in connection with this question when applied to shipping are, as has been pointed out, very large indeed. If the noble Lord could show what is at present by no means certain, that it is really desired by those who engage in this labour that there should be legislation on the subject, and if he could also show us some practical way of carrying out that object, I can assure him that the matter would have the most careful and most minute attention at the hands of the Department which I represent. I should like to call attention to one point in connection with this. It is not two years since the last Merchant Shipping Act was under consideration in this House. I was present throughout those debates, and I have since refreshed my memory by reading what took place, and I cannot find among all the mass of Amendments which the noble Lord placed on the Paper a single one which dealt with this point. If the matter was so urgent that was surely the time to deal with it; and as the noble Lord did not bring it forward then, I do not think he can blame His Majesty's Government for not having dealt with it since. What I understand with regard to Sunday labour is that it is made a matter of agreement between the employers and the seamen at the time of their engagement.

LORD MUSKERRY: No.

LORD HAMILTON OF DALZIEL: Well, that is my information; and, as a rule, those articles of agreement contain a stipulation that in case Sunday labour is found necessary a stated rate of extra pay, usually 6d. or 8d. an hour shall be allowed to the men.

THE EARL OF MEATH: What about the officers?

LORD HAMILTON OF DALZELL: I understand that a similar arrangement is the rule with regard to the officers. I do not say that it is universal, but I am informed that a similar arrangement is the rule, though, of course, the scale of extra remuneration in those cases is higher. We have had no fresh evidence before us since I answered the question put by the noble Lord in June last; and in the circumstances I am sorry to say I cannot return him any different answer. I hope, therefore, he will not press the Motion. But, as I say, if the noble Lord can produce any concrete or practical method of dealing with the matter we shall be only too happy to consider it.

VISCOUNT ST. ALDWYN: My Lords, I think everyone of your Lordships must sympathise in principle with what I understand Lord Muskerry desires to impress upon the House and the country—namely, that Sunday labour in the case of the crews of British merchant ships should be avoided as far as possible. But I am afraid that I must add to that that I sympathise also a great deal with what has just fallen from the noble Lord who represents the Board of Trade. I was myself for four years

Lord Hamilton of Dalzell.

President of the Board of Trade, and while my noble friend behind me and the subsequent speakers were impressing upon the House their objections to Sunday labour I was thinking how, if I had been President of the Board of Trade now, I should have proposed to Parliament to deal with it. I confess I see no way whatever. One thing is quite certain, that on board ship much more than on land it is necessary sometimes that Sunday labour should be done. There may be cases frequently, such as those referred to, where it is absolutely necessary, in the interest of the safety of the ship and of the work being properly done which the ship is sent out to do, that there should be Sunday labour. Therefore, I am sure Lord Muskerry would not propose that a law should be passed that no Sunday labour beyond the ordinary work of the ship should be done by the officers and crew. But if my noble friend would not propose that, what could he propose? All I can see is that the Board of Trade should endeavour, by any suggestions they can make to the parties concerned, to check Sunday labour as far as possible by requiring that where it is demanded extra pay should be given for it. I do not think it is really practicable to do more than that, and therefore, I hope my noble friend will not press this matter to a division.

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, in reference to what has just been said by the noble Viscount, I would point out that all the Mediterranean ports are perfectly safe. There is absolutely no necessity for Sunday labour there; yet Sunday labour does go on there, on British ships though not on foreign ships. Then I come to the suggestion made by Lord Lyveden about leaving the matter to the discretion of the captains. If a captain exercised his discretion and stopped Sunday labour he would be told on his return that there was no further need for his services. That is well known. As to what Lord Hamilton said about extra payment, I have heard on occasions of members of the crew being paid extra for Sundays, but I have never heard—and, as your Lordships know, I am in the way of hearing these things—that an officer has ever received a farthing extra pay for Sunday labour or overtime. The noble Lord who represents the Board of Trade suggested that I should bring forward some proposal for remedying this matter. I think His Majesty's Government should bring it forward. I am not asking for anything unreasonable. Sunday work is going on in the docks at Liverpool, London, and all over the kingdom. Is that necessary? I say it is not; and I shall, therefore, press my Motion to a division.

On Question,

CHILDREN BILL.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."—(Earl Beauchamp.)

On Question, Bill read 3^a.

THE LORD STEWARD (Earl BEAUCHAMP) explained that his first Amendment was of a temporary character, and applied to those children who had been put out to nurse before the passing of this Bill.

Amendment moved—

"In page 2, line 31, after the word 'thereunder,' to insert the words 'Subject as aforesaid, this part of this Act shall apply to an infant whose nursing and maintenance has been undertaken for reward before the passing of this Act, in like manner as it applies to an infant whose nursing and maintenance has been so undertaken after the commencement of this Act, and as if any notice given under the Infant Life Protection Act, 1897, had been a notice given under this part of this Act.'"—(Earl Beauchamp.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Verbal Amendment to Clause 3 agreed to.

EARL BEAUCHAMP moved to amend subsection (2) of Clause 17—

"(2) For the purposes of this section a person shall be deemed to have caused or encouraged the seduction or prostitution (as the case may be) of a girl who has been seduced or become a prostitute if he has knowingly allowed the girl to consort with, or to enter or continue in the employment of, any prostitute or person of notoriously immoral character," by omitting the word "notoriously" and inserting the word "known." He said the Amendment had been submitted to, and approved by, the Lord Chief Justice.

Amendment moved—

"In page 11, line 6, to leave out the word 'notoriously,' and to insert the word 'known.'"
 —(Earl Beauchamp.)

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE was advised that "notoriously" was the word wanted, as it meant generally known, whereas "known" would mean known to nobody in particular. But as the Lord Chief Justice had approved of the Amendment he would not press his objection.

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said his proposed new subsection to Clause 38 was chiefly of the character of his first Amendment.

Amendment moved—

"In page 23, line 14, after the word 'person,' to insert the following new subsection: '(3) This part of this Act shall apply in the case of a child or young person who has before the commencement of this Act been committed to the care of a relative or other fit person by an order made under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904, as if the order had been made under this part of this Act.'"—(Earl Beauchamp.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

EARL BEAUCHAMP moved to amend subsection (3) of Clause 58—

"(3) Where a child, apparently of the age of twelve or thirteen years, who has not previously been convicted, is charged before a Court of summary jurisdiction with an offence punishable in the case of an adult by penal servitude or a less punishment, and the Court is satisfied that the child should be sent to a certified school but, having regard to the special circumstances of the case, should not be sent to a certified reformatory school, and is also satisfied that the character and antecedents of the child are such that he will not exercise an evil influence over the other children in a certified industrial school, the Court may order the child to be sent to a certified industrial school, having previously ascertained that the managers are willing to receive the child,"

by leaving out the words "Court of summary jurisdiction" and inserting the words "Petty Sessional Court." He reminded the House that their Lordships had decided, in Committee, that Courts of summary jurisdiction unless they were Petty Sessional Courts should not have jurisdiction to order a child to be sent to an industrial school.

Amendment moved—

"In page 30, line 29, to leave out the words 'Court of summary jurisdiction,' and to insert the words 'Petty Sessional Court.'"—(Earl Beauchamp.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

EARL BEAUCHAMP moved a number of drafting Amendments to Clause 74, the object of which was, he explained, to transpose the definition of Local authority from subsection (5) to subsection (7). It was thought to be more convenient that it should appear there than in the fifth subsection.

Drafting Amendments to Clause 74 agreed to.

EARL BEAUCHAMP moved to amend subsection (10) of the same clause—

"(10) The local authority responsible for the maintenance of a youthful offender or child in a certified school under this section shall be responsible for his maintenance in the school in which he is for the time being detained, notwithstanding that having been originally ordered to be sent to a reformatory school he is subsequently transferred to an industrial school or having been originally ordered to be sent to an industrial school he is subsequently transferred to or ordered by a Court to be sent to a reformatory school—" by omitting the words "in the school in which he is for the time being detained" and inserting the words "in the event of his transfer to another certified school." This subsection was only intended to cover those cases where a youthful offender or a child, having been sent to one school, was afterwards transferred to another. Their Lordships would see that the words in the subsection as it at present stood were open to a wider construction.

Amendment moved—

"In page 43, lines 17 and 18, to leave out the words 'in the school in which he is for the time being detained,' and to insert the words 'in the event of his transfer to another certified school.'"—(Earl Beauchamp.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Consequential Amendment agreed to.

Drafting Amendments to Clause 92 agreed to.

EARL BEAUCHAMP moved to amend the provision in Clause 105, that—

"A child or young person in detention pursuant to the directions of the Secretary of State may, at any time, be discharged by the Secretary of State on licence—" by deleting the words "child or young." As this clause dealt with cases of prolonged detention of a child who had been guilty, perhaps, of some serious offence, the child when released would be a great deal over sixteen years of age. It was, therefore, desirable to amend the provision in the manner proposed.

Amendment moved—

"In page 59, line 25, to leave out the words 'child or young.'"—(Earl Beauchamp).

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Drafting Amendment agreed to.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said the meaning of the new subsection which he proposed to insert in Clause 111 was clear upon the face of it. It was thought that there might be places which might not be able to make the necessary arrangements before the Act came into force, and this subsection would enable the Secretary of State to postpone the coming into operation of this section as regards those places. He could give the House a pledge, on behalf of the Secretary of State, that he would not use the power further than was absolutely necessary.

Amendment moved—

"In page 65, line 2, after the word 'Treasury,' to insert the following new subsection: "(6) Where it is proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State that arrangements cannot be made for the purpose of complying with this section in any place by the first day of April, nineteen hundred and nine, the Secretary of State may by order postpone the coming into operation of this section as respects that place until such date, not later than the first day of January, nineteen hundred and ten, as may be specified in the order."—(Earl Beauchamp.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Drafting Amendments agreed to Drafting Amendments to Clause 114 agreed to.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE moved to strike out of subsection (2) of Clause 118—

“(2) Any constable who finds a person wandering from place to place and taking a child with him may, if he has reasonable ground for believing that the person is guilty of an offence under this section, apprehend him without a warrant, and may take the child to a place of safety in accordance with the provisions of Part II. of this Act—” the power there given to a constable to apprehend an offender under the clause without a warrant. He urged that the clause proposed to establish a very far-reaching procedure. He could not see why it should be necessary to arrest the father, but the clause gave a policeman power, not only to take charge of the child with a view to its proper education, but also to arrest the father and lock him up. It was not a criminal offence to fail to send a child to school, and in his opinion the power given to arrest the father went far beyond the necessities of the case.

Amendment moved—

“In page 66, line 33, to leave out the words ‘apprehend him without a warrant, and may.’”
(The Earl of Donoughmore.)

THE EARL OF ONSLOW said that those who lived amid the arid heaths and waste lands of Surrey and Sussex knew how impossible it was to get hold of a gypsy. They were here to-day and gone to-morrow, and he felt sure he would be supported by the chief constables when he said that these people were the source of a great deal of the crime in those counties. If power to arrest without a warrant were not taken, the police would never be able to get hold of these men and their children. If the Amendment were agreed to the clause would be rendered nugatory so far as vagrants were concerned. He quite agreed that this was a new departure, but they had to deal with a very peculiar class in these nomads, who were commonly known as gypsies, but had not much of the old glamour that surrounded gypsy tribes. They were, for the most part, loafers and vagrants from the great towns, and more particularly from London. He hoped their Lordships would be content with the modification of the clause about to be proposed by the Lord Steward, which would relieve those who were engaged in a trade or business during certain parts of the year.

EARL BEAUCHAMP also argued that the Amendment would make the clause of no effect. One of the objects in arresting the father was to make him pay. If he got away, there was no power to make him pay.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

EARL BEAUCHAMP moved the insertion of a new subsection, which he said was the outcome of the promise given to Earl Russell by the Lord Privy Seal at an earlier stage that the matter to which the noble Earl called attention should be considered.

Amendment moved—

“In page 66, line 36, after the word ‘Part,’ to insert the following new subsection: ‘(3) Without prejudice to the requirements of the Education Acts, 1870 to 1907, as to school attendance or to proceedings thereunder, this section shall not apply during the months of April to September, inclusive, to any child whose parent or guardian is engaged in a trade of such a nature as to require him to travel from place to place, and who has obtained a certificate of having made not less than two hundred attendances at a public elementary school during the months of October to March immediately preceding, and the power of the Board of Education to make regulations with respect to the issue of certificates of due attendance for the purposes of the Education Acts, 1870 to 1907, shall include a power to make regulations as to the issue of certificates of attendance for the purposes of this section.’”—(Earl Beauchamp.)

EARL RUSSELL expressed the gratitude of those for whom he was acting to the Government for drafting the new subsection, which entirely met his particular opinion. He moved, however, to amend the Amendment by inserting the words, “or business” after the word, “trade.” The expression “trade” might possibly be taken to mean some specified or particular trade recognised by a trade union.

Amendment moved to the Amendment—

“After the word ‘trade’ to insert the words ‘or business.’”—(Earl Russell.)

EARL BEAUCHAMP accepted the Amendment.

On Question, Amendment to the Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE asked the noble Earl in charge of the Bill whether he was satisfied that the words as now drafted covered the case of a tinker who was travelling about the country looking for business. Such a man could not be said to be at the moment actually engaged in a trade or business.

EARL BEAUCHAMP thought that such a case would be covered. The Home Office, however, would consider the point, and, if necessary, the wording could be amended in the other House.

On Question, Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

LORD MONKSWELL next moved a new clause, which, he said, was simply a transfer of Clause 21 of the defunct Licensing Bill to this Bill. He believed the principle had the assent of every Member of their Lordships' House, and, therefore, it was unnecessary to say anything on the merits.

Amendments moved—

"In page 66, after Clause 119, to insert the following new clause: '(1) The holder of the licence of any licensed premises shall not allow a child to be at any time in the bar of the licensed premises, except during the hours of closing. (2) If the holder of a licence acts in contravention of this section, or if any person causes or procures, or attempts to cause or procure, any child to go to or to be in the bar of any licensed premises except during the hours of closing, he shall be liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding, in respect of the first offence, forty shillings, and in respect of any subsequent offence, five pounds. (3) If a child is found in the bar of any licensed premises, except during the hours of closing, the holder of the licence shall be deemed to have committed an offence under this section unless he shows that he has used due diligence to prevent the child being admitted to the bar. (4) Where any person is charged with an offence under this section in respect of a child who is alleged in the charge to be under the age of fourteen, and the child appears to the Court to be under that age, the child shall be deemed to be under that age unless the contrary is shown. (5) Nothing in this section shall apply in the case of a child who is resident but not employed in the licensed premises or in the case of premises constructed, fitted, and intended to be used in good faith for any purpose to which the holding of a licence is merely auxiliary. (6) In this section the bar of licensed premises means any open drinking bar or any part of the premises exclusively or mainly used for the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquor."—(Lord Monkswell).

EARL BEAUCHAMP moved to amend the proposed new clause by omitting subsection (4), the point as to age being already provided for in the Bill, and inserting, as the final subsection, a provision that the expressions "licence" and "licensed premises" had the same meaning as in the Licensing Acts, 1828 to 1906.

Amendment moved to the Amendment—

"To leave out subsection (4), and to insert the following new subsection: '(7) The expressions "licence" and "licensed premises" have the same meaning as in the Licensing Acts, 1828 to 1906.'—(Earl Beauchamp.)

On Question, Amendment to the Amendment agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

EARL BEAUCHAMP moved to leave out the words "Before making any order under this Act with respect to," at the beginning of Clause 122, and to insert other words. He explained that the object of this and the three following Amendments was to make it quite clear that sentences under Clauses 103 and 104 were not to be invalidated by subsequent proof that the child on whom the sentence was passed was not really a child or young person—that was to say, if a mistake had been made in the age the sentence should still be held to be valid.

Amendment moved—

"In page 69, lines 14 and 15, to leave out the words 'Before making any order under this Act with respect to,' and to insert the words 'Where a person is brought before any Court, whether charged with an offence or not, and it appears to the Court that he is.'—(Earl Beauchamp.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Consequential Amendments agreed to.

Drafting Amendments to Clause 128 agreed to.

EARL BEAUCHAMP explained that a gap had been left in Clause 130 in the definitions of "police authority" and "police fund," the Police Act of 1890 not applying to the City of London. The Amendment was drafted to supply that deficiency.

Amendment moved—

"In page 72, line 22, after the word 'fund,' to insert the words 'as respects the City of London, mean the Common Council and the fund out of which the expenses of the City police are defrayed, and elsewhere.'"—(Earl Beauchamp.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

EARL BEAUCHAMP moved an Amendment in Clause 131 consequential upon the new clause which had been inserted on the Motion of Lord Monkswell, the object being to give the proper references to the Scottish Licensing Acts.

Amendment moved—

"In page 75, line 34, after the word '1864,' to insert the words 'and the reference to the Licensing Acts, 1828 to 1906, as a reference to the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, provided that the expression "holder of a licence" means holder of a certificate under the last-mentioned Act.'"—(Earl Beauchamp.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE moved to amend subsection (17) of Clause 132—

"(17) The provisions relating to exemptions from Part I. of this Act shall include any religious or charitable society which shall pay any person for keeping an infant, or any person so employed, provided that such society shall have obtained from the Local Government Board a certificate that it is a fit and proper institution to be exempted from the provisions of that part of this Act," by leaving out all the words after "The provisions relating to exemptions from Part I of this Act shall" and inserting the words in his Amendment which had been suggested to him by the Irish Office as better than those which their Lordships had been good enough to insert, on his Motion, at an earlier stage.

Amendment moved—

"In page 81, line 16, to leave out from the word 'shall' to the end of the subsection, and to insert the words 'extend to any person who undertakes for reward the nursing and maintenance of such infants only as are boarded-out with him by some religious or charitable society or institution approved by the Local Government Board for Ireland.'"—(The Earl of Donoughmore.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Drafting Amendments agreed to.

Privilege Amendments agreed to.

Moved "That the Bill do now pass." (Earl Beauchamp.)

On Question, Bill passed, and returned to the Commons, and to be printed as amended. [No. 233.]

House adjourned at Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

DISEASES OF ANIMALS ACTS,
1894 TO 1903.

Copy presented, of an Order, No. 7605, dated 21st November, 1908, permitting the landing at Deptford Foreign Animals Wharf of Animals carried on board the s.s. "Marquette" [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

DISEASES OF ANIMALS ACTS,
1894 TO 1903.

Copy presented, of an Order, No. 7606, dated 21st November, 1908, permitting the landing at the Deptford Foreign Animals Wharf of Animals carried on board the s.s. "Minnehaha" [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

POOR RELIEF (ENGLAND AND WALES).

Return presented, relative thereto [ordered 22nd July; Mr. Masterman]; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 340.]

LOCAL TAXATION RETURNS (ENGLAND AND WALES).

Copy presented, of the Annual Local Taxation Returns for 1906-7. Part II. [by Act]; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 333.]

IRISH LAND PURCHASE ACTS.

Copy presented, of Return giving by Counties and Provinces the area, Poor Law valuation, and purchase money of: (a) Lands sold; and (b) lands in respect of which proceedings have been instituted and are pending for sale under the Irish Land Purchase Acts; also the estimated area, Poor Law valuation, and purchase money of lands in respect of which proceedings for sale have not been instituted under the said Acts [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Old-Age Pensions Regulation.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether a man and his wife, whose joint income amounts to £27 3s. 2d. per annum are entitled to the full pension, the income being derived as follows: Miners' Permanent Relief Fund £12 9s. 2d., friendly society, £5 4s., interest on money invested £3, allowed for free house £6 10s., both applicants being over seventy years of age.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) If the whole income belonged to the husband he would be entitled to a pension of 2s. If less than the whole he would be entitled to from 2s. to 5s., according to the amount of his income. The wife (provided that the part, if any, of the joint income which was her exclusive property did not exceed £21 a year) would be entitled to a pension of 5s.

Extra Police in County Galway.

MR. HAZLETON (Galway, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state how the extra police at present stationed in County Galway are distributed; and the reasons in each case for the continued retention of these men in each district.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The present distribution of the extra force in the County of Galway is as follows—viz.—

	Head Constables.	Sergeants and Constables.
Athenry Constabulary District - - -	1	57
Ballinasloe " " - - -	—	39
Loughrea " " - - -	—	60
Mountbellew " " - - -	—	39
Portumna " " - - -	—	8
Woodford " " - - -	—	17
Clifden " " - - -	—	3
Dumnore " " - - -	—	25
Galway " " - - -	—	20
Gort " " - - -	—	45
Oughterard " " - - -	—	3
Tuam " " - - -	—	29
Total - - -	1	345

The extra force in each of the districts with the exception of Oughterard, is required to prevent cattle-driving and forms of disorder arising therefrom, to protect certain persons who require protection, and generally to preserve the peace. The three police in Oughterard district are required for emergencies elsewhere in the West Riding, but are lodged in that district because there is no room to house them in other districts.

Irish Land Stock.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH (Maidstone); To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, under the new Irish Land Bill, it is proposed that vendors under agreements lodged before 1st November should have the option of taking, in lieu of cash, either Two and three-quarters per cent. Guaranteed Stock at a minimum of 92, on the lines proposed by the Departmental Committee of the Treasury, or the proposed new Three per cent. Stock at its face value; and whether vendors subsequent to 1st November will have any option or will be compelled to accept payment in Three per cent. Stock only.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) I would refer the noble Lord to Clauses 3 (2) and 3 (3) of the Bill which has just been issued.

Restoration of the Siggishaggard Evicted Tenants.

MR. FFRENCH (Wexford, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Siggishaggard evicted tenants belonging to the Carew estate, who were evicted about 1886, have not yet been restored to their homes, although the estate was sold some time ago; and whether, as neither landlord nor anybody else objects to their restoration, he can say what is the cause of the delay.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) This estate has not yet been sold to the Estates Commissioners, but the owner informed the Commissioners on the 12th instant that he was prepared to accept the prices estimated by them for the evicted farms. The evicted tenants will, it is hoped, be reinstated at an early date.

Land for Evicted Tenants on the Douglas Estate.

MR. J. PHILLIPS (Longford, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Estates Commissioners are about to acquire compulsorily for the benefit of the evicted tenants about 400 acres of land on the Douglas estate, County Longford; whether, with a view to fixing the price, an inspector visited and inspected these lands only last week; whether within the last few days a local grazier's son named Harris Martin has stepped in and become tenant of part of the lands about to be so acquired; and, if so, will he, in the interest of the peace of the district, request the Estates Commissioners to expedite the negotiations and clear out the new occupier.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I am making inquiries as to the case, and will communicate the result to the hon. Member.

Share of Bog Land on Irish Estates.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what steps have been taken by the Estates Commissioners on estates where sales are completed and the lands vested in the tenants to secure that labourers having houses and plots of their own, or labourers living in district council cottages on those estates, get portions of the common bog in each of those estates; and whether, to secure that those labourers shall in future get turf on the bog of the estate in which their houses are situate, he will request the Estates Commissioners to issue a new rule, insisting that all labourers shall get a share of the common bog on each estate.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) Where an advance is made to trustees under Section 4 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, for the purchase of land containing turbary, the land is vested in the trustees subject to a scheme framed in accordance with Section 20 of the Act. Under such schemes the trustees have power, when the reasonable requirements of the purchasing tenants have been provided for, to permit other persons in the neighbourhood to cut turf on the land on such conditions as to payment as the trustees may prescribe. The case of the sale of an estate where portion of the holding consists of bog, on which the purchaser had not an exclusive right of turbary, is provided for by Section 21 of the Act of 1903, as amended by Section 24 of the Labourers (Ireland) Act, 1906. No alteration in the existing practice appears to be necessary.

Administration of Tubrid School, County Fermanagh.

MR. JORDAN (Fermanagh, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been drawn to the alleged mal-administration of the charity known as the Tubrid School, situated in County Fermanagh, Ireland, by the rector of the parish and the body known as the governors; is he aware that there exists considerable excitement in the county and neighbourhood at the treatment said to have been given to the boys under the trust; is he aware of the public desire that an efficient inquiry should be appointed to investigate the manner in which this charity has been administered; and whether he proposes to institute such an inquiry.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The institution referred to appears to be that known as Vaughan's Charitable School. I would refer the hon. Member to the Answer given by my right hon. friend the Attorney-General for Ireland to a Question on the subject asked by the hon. Member for the St. Patrick's division on the 23rd instant.

Irish Land Purchase Prices.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state, in the case where the selling landlord under the Land Purchase Act, 1903, has been paid his agreed price, and where the tenant purchaser, owing to delay in getting his vesting order, continues to pay the Land Commissioner $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the agreed price, what becomes of the extra $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. paid by the tenant purchaser sometimes for months; does it go to facilitate land purchase, does the Treasury benefit, or is it placed to the credit of the tenant purchaser.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I understand the hon. Member to refer to cases in which the Land Commission purchase estates under Section 6 or 7 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, for resale. In such cases Section 18 of the Act provides that the interest payable to the Land Commission under Section 35 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896, shall be at the rate of not less than $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum. Estates so purchased frequently include a considerable extent of untenanted land which may have to be held by the Commissioners before distribution for some time after the vendor has been paid his agreed price. This involves expenses of management and the payment of local rates and taxes. The $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. referred to in the Question is required for these payments, and also for a working balance to meet the claims of the National Debt Commissioners which, if not met when due, would have to be advanced out of the Guarantee Fund. The Treasury does not benefit.

Police Protection of Mr. Lewis, of County Galway.

MR. JOHN ROCHE (Galway, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number and cost of the extra police employed as a protection force for Mr. Lewis, County Galway; and whether he can give any reason why such expenditure should be continued.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) Five extra police are employed for the protection of the Messrs. Lewis and their property. Their pay amounts to £286 per annum. It is hoped that the matter which necessitated the employment of this extra force will shortly be settled, and that it will be possible to withdraw the police.

Eviction of Mr. Walsh, of Kilmurry, County Kerry.

MR. J. MURPHY (Kerry, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state by whose authority a force of police accompanied the Under-Sheriff of the County of Kerry to evict Mr. Richard J. Walsh, of Kilmurry, Castleisland, County Kerry, recently, when it was a matter of public notoriety that Mr. Walsh's mother, an old woman of eighty years, was unfit for removal, and considerable expense to the public funds thereby incurred.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The police force attended upon the requisition of the sheriff. The authorities are bound to afford sufficient protection in such cases. The sheriff declined to act on the rumour that Mrs. Walsh was ill and unable to be moved, but he took a doctor to examine the sick woman, and, upon his certificate, further proceedings were abandoned.

Bonus on Irish Land Purchase Agreements.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the case that since the publication of the new Treasury Regulations any further purchase agreements will be subject to the fact that only a bonus of 3 per cent. will be available unless and until the new Irish Land Bill is passed into law; and can he say whether in any future agreements, pending the passing of fresh legislation, tenant purchasers will have to pay the increased interest of 3 per cent. now proposed, or will they only be liable for payment of the old rate of $2\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Answer to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative. The Answer to the second part is that, pending the passing of fresh legislation, there is no power to make the rate of interest 3 per cent. or any rate different from the old rate of 2½ per cent.

Kneller Hall Training for Army Musicians attached to Regiments serving Abroad.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether it would be possible to make arrangements for promising musicians serving with battalions out of the United Kingdom to have the advantage of training at the Kneller Hall School of Military Music; is he aware that musicians with regiments abroad are in many cases during all or almost all their term of service deprived of this advantage where they join a corps just going or that has recently gone on foreign service or that is sent on foreign service soon after they join; and is he aware that in many cases the men would be willing to contribute to any extra cost involved in their going home for some musical training.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) In making selections of soldiers for training as bandsmen at Kneller Hall the claims of those belonging to units serving abroad are not overlooked, and, at the present time, more than one-fourth of the total number under training belong to such units. In the case of boys enlisting at home for the band of a unit serving abroad endeavours are made to have them trained at Kneller Hall before they are sent abroad. Bandsmen serving abroad, on completing six years service abroad, can, if they have nine years total service, apply to be sent to the home battalion, and their places are then filled by bandsmen from home who have probably undergone a course at the school. During the past year forty-three men belonging to units abroad have been trained at the school.

Official Board of Arbitration.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Government will take into immediate consideration the advisability of conferring with the Labour Members respecting the establishment of an official Board of Arbitration upon the principles already in operation in certain British Colonies and Continental countries, with a view to the amicable settlement of trade disputes.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) In view of the great variety of principles on which Foreign and Colonial Arbitration Acts are based, I am not quite clear as to the particular principles to which the hon. Member refers, but I would remind him that I have recently set up a standing Court of Arbitration with a view to giving better effect to the intention of the Conciliation Act. He will find particulars of the scheme in the Memorandum which I have caused to be forwarded to him. I propose to await experience of this scheme before considering other proposals.

Hours of Drivers and Firemen on Midland Great Western Railway.

MR. FIELD: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that drivers and firemen working His Majesty's mail on the Midland Great Western lines are working twelve hours per day, and that the nine hours of duty is systematic instead of being used in cases of urgency; whether he is aware that ballast drivers, firemen, and guards are working twelve, fourteen, and sometimes sixteen hours per day for five days of the week and then get a day off to make the total number of hours for the week look small; and whether he can state what is the delay in appointing the conciliation boards on the Midland Great Western line.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) As regards hours of duty the Board have received a letter from the company, of which I am forwarding a copy to the hon. Member. The explanations given therein will be carefully examined. Details of a scheme of conciliation boards for this railway have been arranged, and the company state that circulars and nomination papers will be issued to the staff with as little delay as possible.

MR. FIELD: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that several railway companies in Ireland have lodging houses or barracks for their drivers, firemen, and guards when booked away from home; whether he can state if these men get proper rest, as the nature of their duties are onerous; whether he will state what steps are taken to see that these lodging-houses or barracks are in proper sanitary condition; and whether he is aware that these lodging houses or barracks are sometimes situate in the precincts of busy shunting yards, where operations are carried on day and night.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The sanitary condition of the lodging-houses or barracks referred to is not a matter within the jurisdiction of the Board of Trade, but if the hon. Member furnishes me with specific instances in which it is affirmed that owing to the situation of the houses the men occupying them are unable to obtain proper rest, I will carefully consider whether representations on the subject can usefully be made to the railway company or companies concerned.

American Gooseberry Mildew Fungicides.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he can give a complete list of the names of the fungicides in use against American gooseberry mildew on which the Board have been consulted by local authorities, and which the Board have declared to be efficient; and whether the Board will publish regularly the names of such approved fungicides, as is done in the case of sheep-dips.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) The preparations on which the Board have been consulted by local authorities are: (1) Chafer's dressing for American gooseberry-mildew; (2) Herrod's gooseberry-mildew dressing; (3) Simplex spray fluid; (4) V₂K fluid. Each was stated to contain in the strength prescribed by the Order liver of sulphur which the Board regard as the effective fungicide. As the preparations did not appear to contain any ingredient which would reduce the efficiency of the liver of sulphur or injure the bushes, the Board raised no objection to their use. The Board do not think that any useful purpose would be served at the present time by undertaking the examination and approval of proprietary preparations.

Work for Unemployed on Hackney Marshes.

MR. BROOKE (Tower Hamlets, Bow and Bromley): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can state what are the reasons why the Central (Unemployed) Body with Hackney Marshes contiguous to the East End of London, have not long ago proposed a scheme or schemes for its reclamation, etc., which would have provided work for a large number of the unemployed during this winter of acute distress.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The subject has not been lost sight of by the Central (Unemployed) Body. There are about 160 men now employed at Hackney Marshes whose wages are defrayed by the Central Body and a further scheme of work in connection therewith is now under their consideration.

Work for Unemployed at Poplar.

MR. BROOKE: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that since his Order removing the disqualifications of poor law relief and of two successive periods of works under the Central (Unemployed) Body, 772 men have registered themselves at the offices of the Poplar Distress Committee, making, together with those registered previous to that Order, a total, up to 21st November, of 2,932 men; and whether, considering that, up to the same date, only 202 of this total had been given work by the Central (Unemployed) Body, he proposes to take any steps to accelerate the action of that body in providing work for more of these men.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I understand that the numbers stated in the Question are substantially correct. I believe that the Central (Unemployed) Body are making every effort to find suitable work for the unemployed of Poplar and elsewhere in London, and that they have now several schemes under consideration.

Second Division Clerkship Examinations.

MR. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware of the inconvenience caused to candidates who are preparing themselves for examination for clerkships in the second division of the Civil Service, by the intimation issued by the Civil Service Commissioners that it is not likely that a competition will be required in the spring and summer of 1909; and whether he can name any prospective date for the next competitive examination for clerkships in the second division.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) Examinations for clerkships in the Civil Service, whether in the second division or otherwise, are necessarily held to meet the requirements of public departments. While, therefore, I regret that inconvenience should be caused to candidates by the suspension of examinations, I could not regard such a reason as a justification for holding examinations when not required. As regards the immediate future I understand that the present supply of second division clerks will satisfy the public requirements for a great many months to come, and I do not think it would be possible at this stage to name even an approximate date for the next examination.

Proposed Purchase of Disused Coast-guard Station at Fethard by New Ross Board of Guardians.

MR. FFRENCH: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the New Ross Board of Guardians made an offer to the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, about eighteen months ago, to purchase one of the houses belonging to the disused Coast-guard station at Fethard for £120, or to rent it at £6 a year, proposing to use it as a dispensary; and whether, as no reply has been sent to the New Ross Guardians, he will ascertain what the Commissioners propose to do with reference to the guardians' offer.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) I am informed that the house in question had to be reserved for the Customs service, and that this fact was pointed out in the course of correspondence between the Board's local officer and the clerk of the union, who subsequently discussed at an interview the possibility of the guardians acquiring another of the station houses. Pending the receipt of the further views of the guardians the matter has been in abeyance. The Board are redeeming the head rent charged on the property, and, as soon as the legal formalities have been completed, the property will be publicly advertised for sale, and the guardians will be invited to make an offer for such portion of the premises as will not be required for public purposes.

Civil Service Pensions—Widows and Orphans.

MR. FIELD: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can state the approximate number of civil servants with pensionable service who have died since the promise of early action in connection with deferred pay was made by the Treasury in February last, and whose widows and orphans have consequently been deprived of sums which are admittedly their due; whether, in view of the constantly increasing number of widows and orphans of civil servants who are thus deprived of an admitted right, he will inquire whether the introduction of legislation on the subject has already been unduly delayed; and whether the matter can be expedited so as to admit of an immediate remedy for the existing state of affairs.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I have no statistics of the number of deaths of civil servants with pensionable service since February last, nor can I say how many of them, if the proposed new scheme had been in operation, would have elected to sacrifice a part of the benefits secured them by the existing Superannuation Acts in order to secure the contemplated life assurance. There is, of course, no question of depriving the widows and orphans of such civil servants of anything due to them. The preparation of a Bill is being proceeded with as rapidly as possible, and it will, as I have already promised, be introduced next session. Regard being had to the complexity of the subject, I do not think there has been any unreasonable delay.

Railway Companies' Contributions to Local Rates.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can state the amounts contributed annually by the railways of the United Kingdom to the Exchequer and to local rates respectively.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I am unable to give the specific information desired by the right hon. Member in regard to contributions by British railways. I may, however, say that the amount of railway passenger duty received in 1907-8 was—

For England	-	321,684
For Scotland	-	23,377
Total	-	£345,061

Old-Age Pensions in Scotland—Issue of Regulations in Gaelic.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, in view of the fact that the majority of persons over seventy years of age in the Western Highlands and Islands of Scotland speak Gaelic only, will he consider the expediency of having the regulations in regard to old-age pensions issued in those districts in Gaelic.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I may refer my hon. friend to the Answer which I gave on the 3rd instant to my hon. friend the Member for Sutherland. If he will bring to my notice any case of hardship, I shall be glad to have it inquired into, and will see that the necessary steps are taken in the matter.

Civil Rights of Christian Converts from the Hindu Religion.

MR. E. H. LAMB (Rochester): To ask the Under-Secretary for India whether his attention has been called to an Answer given to a Question put in this House by the present Lord President of the Council, to the effect that in the case of Dasappa v. Chikkamma, dated 21st December, 1894, the chief Court of Mysore decided that a convert to Christianity, in consequence of his change of faith was ipso facto deprived of his right of guardianship over his children, and it was stated that an apostate from the Hindu religion loses his civil rights; whether his attention has been called to a judgment, dated 2nd September, 1907, delivered in the same State, of which the result has been that converts to the Christian religion suffer greater disability, by Hindu law, than one convicted and imprisoned for murder, inasmuch as converts are deprived of the ability to sue for their civil rights; whether he can supply a copy of the judgment referred to; whether he is aware that the Mysore Durbar appointed an influential committee, on which all castes were represented, to draft a regulation for the removal of these disabilities, but that such regulation, although prepared and published, was not adopted; and whether, in view of this draft regulation not having been brought into force, he can see his way to approach the Government of India with a view to suggesting to the Mysore Durbar the advisability of introducing the measure in question or some similar measure in order to remove the disabilities under which native converts to Christianity now suffer.

(Answered by Mr. Buchanan.) The Secretary of State is aware of the Answer given in this House on 12th March, 1903, as to the disabilities attaching to converts from Hinduism in the Mysore State. His attention has been drawn to the judgment of the chief Court of Mysore, to which the hon. Members refers, but he does not possess a copy of the judgment and cannot speak as to its exact purport. He has been informed unofficially that no steps have yet been taken by the Mysore Durbar to give effect to a regulation on the subject drawn up by a committee appointed by them. The Government of India are being asked to report upon the present position of the question.

Evicted Tenants—Case of Myles Sweeney.

MR. F. MEEHAN (Leitrim, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have taken any action in the case of Myles Sweeney, of Lisacoghel, Drumkeerin, an evicted tenant on the Montgomery estate, County Leitrim, who was reinstated in May last and has not received any portion of the free grant to enable him to rebuild his house and stock his farm.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have not sanctioned any grant in this case.

Purchase of the Deering and Quinton Dick Estate at Dunmore.

MR. HAZLETON: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have been able to locate the whereabouts of Mr. George E. Deering; whether they have made any proposal to him for the sale of his Dunmore, County Galway, property; and whether they can give any information as to the position in which the Captain Quinton Dick (late Handcock) property, of Corrontilla, Dunmore, County Galway, now stands.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they are not in a position to give any particulars in reference to these properties, which do not appear to be pending for sale before them.

Rents on the Roderick O'Connor Estate.

MR. HAZLETON: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Congested Districts Board, which purchased the Roderick O'Connor estate in May, 1907, have again demanded this month from the tenants on the Galway portion of the estate the old rents without any reduction; if so, will he say why has no reduction been made as expected, and when is it to come into operation.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) A year's rent has been demanded by the Congested Districts Board, as stated in the Question. The estate has not yet been vested in the Congested Districts Board as their property, and they have therefore no power to reduce the rents. The holdings on the Galway section of the estate will be re-sold as soon as possible after the estate has been vested in the Board.

Irish Junior Assistant Teachers Standard of Efficiency.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what standard of efficiency is being insisted upon by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland in the case of junior assistant teachers who have at least two years service, in order that they may qualify for their share of the £114,000 grant; whether he is aware that no stipulation whatever was made as to efficiency when the scale of payments was passed by Parliament; and what the Commissioners propose to do with moneys saved through some junior assistant teachers proving inefficient.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I would refer the hon. Member to the revised Supplementary Estimate of 28th July last (H.C. Paper 255) in which it is stipulated that junior assistant mistresses sharing in the grant should have two years efficient service. The Commissioners of National Education inform me that a moderate standard of efficiency is required. I am unable to reply to the concluding portion of the Question, as the Commissioners have not yet completed the payment of junior assistant mistresses.

Purchase of Colonel Blake's Estate at Carnacon.

MR. CONOR O'KELLY (Mayo, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state whether the negotiations between the Estates Commissioners and Colonel M. C. J. Blake for the purchase of the latter's property at Carnacon, Ballyglass, County Mayo, have been successful; and, if not, will he state the cause.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) In view of pending legislation the Estates Commissioners have decided not to make any offer for the estate at present.

Delay in Purchase of Estate at Caploughlan.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what is the cause of the delay in the completion of the sale to the tenants of the estate of the Endowed Commissioners of Education, situated at Caploughlan, Mountrath, Queen's County, whose agreements have been signed over two years; and, in view of the fact that the tenants are paying 4 per cent. on the purchase money, will he see that the vesting order is issued in this case with the least possible delay.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that the purchase agreements in respect of this estate were not lodged until June, 1907. The Commissioners will deal with them in their proper order and with due regard to the priority of other estates in which the agreements were lodged earlier.

Sentence of Patrick Sweeney.

MR. DELANY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, seeing that the appeal of Patrick Sweeney, Killadooley, Ballybrophy, Queen's County, fell through owing to a technical error on the part of his solicitors, who was sentenced to a term of six months imprisonment with hard labour by Messrs. Dease and Fitzgerald, resident magistrates, at the petty sessions in Rathdowney last July, for an alleged assault on the police-sergeant of Borris-in-Ossory, in connection with a cattle-drive, and after the expiration of this term ordered to find bail for twelve months or in default to go to prison for another six months, and taking into consideration that Sweeney had no time to prepare his defence, being arrested only a few hours before the Court sat, he will recommend a mitigation of the sentence.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) Patrick Sweeney was convicted at Rathdowney petty sessions in July last, of having assaulted a sergeant of the Royal Irish Constabulary while in the execution of his duty, by striking him on the head with a heavy club, and the sentence mentioned in the Question was imposed. He appealed to Quarter Sessions, but the Court decided that they had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal as the necessary notice had not been served. It is not within my province to advise the Lord-Lieutenant in his exercise of the clemency of the Crown, or to make any recommendation to His Excellency on the subject. I understand that the Lord-Lieutenant has already carefully considered a memorial sent to him by the prisoner, and has decided that the law must take its course.

Payment of Salaries of Irish National School Teachers.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state if the Board of National Education is aware of the inconveniences and often hardships inflicted on Irish national teachers by the present practice of the Board in returning all salary claims, when passed for payment, to the managers of the schools, instead of sending them direct to the teachers; whether, in view of the fact that the manager has countersigned the claim in the first instance, and must therefore know its nature, what reason does the Board advance for returning the claim to him; and whether, if the Board cannot see its way to reverse its practice in all cases, would it be prepared to forward the claims direct in individual cases if requested to do so by the managers concerned.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I would refer the hon. Member to my reply to a similar Question asked by the hon. Member for West Clare on the 26th February, 1907..

Sale of the Jordan Estate at Cloanmore.

MR. JOHN O'DONNELL (Mayo, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Jordan estate, situate at Cloanmore, Murneen Electoral District of the Claremorris Union, has been offered for sale to the Congested Districts Board; and, if so, whether he will state the number of years purchase asked by the landlord and offered by the Board, and when the negotiations will be completed.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) This estate was offered to the Congested Districts Board in 1905; but, owing to the want of funds for improvements, they had in the following year to postpone the matter. The position remains unaltered.

Drainage of the River Robe.

MR. JOHN O'DONNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Congested Districts Board have considered the advisability of undertaking the whole of the drainage of the River Robe, County Mayo; and, if so, whether there would be any chance of having the work started early in the coming spring, with a view to saving hundreds of acres that are flooded in the spring and autumn of each year and thereby rendered almost useless to the tenants.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I have nothing to add to my reply to a Question on this subject asked by the hon. Member on the 14th April last.

Count Blake Estate, County Mayo.

MR. JOHN O'DONNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Count Blake estate, situate at Ballinafad, in the Castlebar Union, County Mayo, has been offered for sale to the Estates Commissioners or to the Congested Districts Board; and, if so, what is the number of years purchase asked by the landlord, and the number offered, if any, by either of the bodies named.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) This estate has not been offered for sale to the Congested Districts Board or the Estates Commissioners.

Begley Estate, Iskerlavally.

MR. JOHN O'DONNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Begley estate, Iskerlavally, in the Claremorris Union, was offered to the Congested Districts Board for sale; and if so, how many years purchase was asked by the landlord and how many was offered by the tenants; whether the estate was inspected by the Board; whether the sale was sanctioned; and, if not, will he say why.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The estate has been purchased by the Congested Districts Board.

Acquisition of Sir Compton Domville's Estate.

MR. JOHN O'DONNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Congested Districts Board have yet done anything in the way of acquiring the estate of Sir Compton Domville, situate in the parish of Aughamore, in the Claremorris Union; and, if not, whether they will re-open negotiations with a view to a speedy sale of the grass lands thereon, and the removal of congestion in the immediate neighbourhood.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The question of purchasing this estate was brought before the Congested Districts Board some time ago; but, owing to the want of funds for making improvements, they were obliged to postpone the matter. The solicitors for the estate were so informed in October, 1907. The position remains unaltered.

Sons of Head Constables and Cadetships in Royal Irish Constabulary.

MR. JOHN O'DONNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the sons of officers in the Royal Irish Constabulary and other young men who can procure nominations are eligible for examination for cadetships in that force, and that the sons of head constables, many of whom were prevented by the age limit from attaining higher rank, are debarred; and, if so, whether he will take the necessary steps to enable them to secure nomination for such examinations.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The facts are as stated. I do not propose to make any change in the existing system.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Portsmouth Government Contracts and Fair Wages.

MR. T. F. RICHARDS (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the fact that the firm of Messrs. Morrison and Mason, Government contractors at Portsmouth, are not observing the Fair Wage Clause in the payment of their labourers; and whether he will take action in the matter.

MR. BRAMSDON (Portsmouth): At the same time may I ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the contract with Messrs. Mason and Morrison, in connection with the construction of the new lock at Portsmouth, contains the Fair Wage Clause; if so, is he aware that the labourers employed by that firm are being paid 5d. per hour instead of 6d., the recognised rate in the neighbourhood; whether outside labourers are being engaged notwithstanding that there are still local men unemployed; and what course the Admiralty intend to adopt in the matter.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. MCKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): The point raised in the Question is one of considerable difficulty, and my hon. friend the Financial Secretary has gone into the whole matter with the greatest care. To summarise the conclusions come to, it would appear that 6d. an hour is the current rate for builders' labourers, but that the corporation and other employers who recognise this rate for general labourers do in fact pay less than 6d. per hour, and in some cases as little as 4½d., for labour which may be regarded as less skilled than that of the builders' labourer. The joint committee of the local railway companies pay men engaged on their permanent way 18s. per week, which, at forty-eight hours per week, would represent 4½d. an hour, and some of the unskilled labourers in the dockyard are paid at the rate of 5½d. an hour. From all the evidence, it appears to be shown conclusively that, while the current rate for builders' labourers is 6d. an hour, the rate current in the locality for less skilled labour is certainly below that figure. Having regard to the class of labour employed by Messrs. Morrison and Mason for which they pay less than 6d. per hour, it cannot be said, on a review of all the circumstances, and of the rate current in the locality, that there has been any infraction of the Fair Wages Clause.

MR. T. F. RICHARDS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this firm paid 27s. 6d. up to September, and then reduced wages without notice?

MR. MCKENNA: I was not aware of that fact.

MR. T. F. RICHARDS: Did not the Department three weeks ago apply to the United Trades Labour Council at Portsmouth in regard to this matter?

MR. MCKENNA: Yes, Sir.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, College): How is the recognised rate in the neighbourhood arrived at? Does it not vary in different trades?

MR. MCKENNA: It varies more particularly in regard to the cost of living in the district. The Admiralty only discover it by close inquiry among all firms.

MR. CORRIE GRANT (Warwickshire, Rugby): When the Secretary to the Admiralty makes inquiries does he consult the leaders of the local trade unions?

MR. MCKENNA: I will inquire.

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich): Does he consult those who pay the lowest wages only?

MR. MCKENNA: I do not think that is a suggestion which ought to be made. We consult all the employers in a neighbourhood, and those whom we have consulted in this instance recognise that though the rate referred to is a low one for builders' labourers a still lower rate obtains for less skilled labour.

MR. W. THORNE (West Ham, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to attach a schedule rate of wages to all official contracts?

MR. MCKENNA: No. We are acting on the rule laid down by the House of Commons in its Resolution.

MR. W. THORNE: The results are not very satisfactory.

Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve.

MR. R. DUNCAN (Lanarkshire, Govan): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty when a definite decision may be expected on the question of issuing fresh kits to members of the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve who have completed three years service, and also on the question of granting signal ratings to members of the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve who have specialised in signalling; whether he is aware that the first matter has engaged the attention of the Admiralty for over two years, and the second one for more than eleven months; and whether he proposes to take steps to secure that Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve matters shall be settled in future with greater expedition.

MR. MCKENNA: A temporary arrangement for issuing new kits to Volunteers who enrol after completing three years was approved in December last and is still in force. Details of a scheme on the basis of the new Army system are now under the consideration of the Admiralty Volunteer Committee.

The question of the formation of a signal branch of the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve involves financial consideration and correspondence with another Department, and it is hoped that a decision will be arrived at before very long. These matters have been under consideration for the time stated. In both cases there have been considerable financial difficulties, and it is not considered that any avoidable delay has taken place.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the great difficulty caused to recruiting by the action of the Admiralty?

MR. MCKENNA: I do not think we are causing any difficulty in that way. We deplore the delay quite as much as the right hon. Gentleman, and I have explained it in the best way I can.

Sunday Labour at Rosyth.

MR. GULLAND (Dumfries Burghs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the feeling in Scotland against Sunday labour, and seeing that the declared object of pushing on with the works at Rosyth is to give immediate employment rather than to have an early completion, he will insert a clause in the contracts forbidding Sunday labour.

MR. LEE (Hampshire, Fareham): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that, may I ask whether he or any other authority has been committed publicly or otherwise to the statement that the object of pushing on with the works at Rosyth is to give immediate employment rather than to have an early completion?

MR. MCKENNA: No such statement has been made expressly or implied, publicly or privately. Work such as that of pumping may have to be carried on at any time, including Sunday; but Sunday work is discouraged and is not allowed without the written permission of the superintending engineer.

Coastguard Stations in the Isle of Wight.

MR. REMNANT (Finsbury, Holborn): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if it had been decided to withdraw the coastguard Foreland, Ventnor division what provision will be made Bembridge lifeboat of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution at present manned by these men.

MR. MCKENNA: It has been decided to close the Foreland coastguard detachment, at which there are three men, on the 1st December, 1908, but three coastguard men will continue to reside at Foreland for duty at Culver Cliff signal station. All arrangements for manning Royal National Lifeboat Institution lifeboats are made by the Royal National Lifeboat Institution. The crew of the coastguard station at Bembridge, and the three men above mentioned at Foreland, will be available to assist the lifeboat service as far as their other naval and revenue duties permit, provided the men themselves volunteer for the service. The coastguard men are not liable to be ordered on lifeboat service.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): At what date was this decision come to?

MR. MCKENNA: I cannot say without notice.

Distribution of Cavalry.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War on what principle the present distribution of cavalry in the United Kingdom is based.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): The primary consideration in the distribution of cavalry regiments in the United Kingdom is the accommodation which actually exists for them. Subject to this consideration every endeavour is made to group, in proximity to one another, the units of the various cavalry brigades of the field Army, thus rendering possible the supervision by the brigadier of the regiments under his command.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lancashire, N.W.): Can the right hon. Gentleman give an approximate date at which the application of this provision to Scotland is likely to result in the stationing of a cavalry regiment there?

Insanitary Barracks.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will grant a Return showing the barracks in the United Kingdom which are reported by the Army Medical Department to be in an indifferent sanitary state, as judged by modern standards.

MR. HALDANE: It is quite obvious that, owing to the date of construction of the barracks, many of our buildings must necessarily fall short of what is considered desirable in these days; but I am not prepared to admit that any are in a dangerous condition, and I cannot agree that the Return asked for should be compiled.

MR. ASHLEY: But as we know officially that many of the barracks are in an indifferent condition from a sanitary point of view why should not the House be told which they are?

MR. HALDANE: The House may gather from official Reports that there is a state of things which we very much deplore and which we are getting put right as quickly as possible. But it is impossible to go into detail as to the various barracks.

The Irish Command.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how it is proposed to train in peace the 6th Division of the Irish Command for the duties it will have to perform in war, in view of the fact that not even divisional cavalry of two squadrons is stationed in the command.

MR. HALDANE: The divisional cavalry are formed on mobilisation from the mounted infantry, and in this respect the 6th Division does not differ from the other divisions. As regards training, the necessary mounted troops can be provided from the cavalry brigade or from the South Irish Horse.

MR. ASHLEY: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman see his way to spend a small amount of money in order that a cavalry regiment may be stationed there?

MR. HALDANE: That is quite unnecessary, as the hon. Member will see if he looks at the organisation.

New Field Howitzer.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State of War whether he can now give any information with reference to the recent trials of the new field howitzer, especially as to weight and range.

MR. HALDANE: No, Sir. I am not at present in a position to give information to the hon. Member.

Canadian Immigration Law.

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can now state whether it is still possible for a British subject to be summarily deported from the Dominion of Canada without any form of trial and on the ground of being temporarily out of employment.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Colonel Seely, Liverpool, Abercromby): As I stated in reply to my hon. friend's Question on the 2nd November, the Secretary of State is in communication with the Dominion Government on the question of the law to which he refers, and I am not yet in a position to give any further information on the subject.

British Indians in Transvaal Prisons.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has received any official information showing that the Indians, including Mr. Gandhi, were on the 17th October working on the market square of Volksrust at road-making.

COLONEL SEELY: It appears from a telegram from the Governor of 3rd November that Mr. Gandhi, who worked on an agricultural shows grounds digging holes for trees and weeding in a municipal plantation and the gaol garden, had never performed hard labour on the public streets. The telegram does not state whether this was true also of the other Indians.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): Was not this gentleman imprisoned for a purely technical offence?

COLONEL SEELY: I have given all the information in my possession.

MR. BYLES (Salford, N.): Is Mr. Gandhi the gentleman who delivered an address to Members of this House here a year ago?

COLONEL SEELY: I do not know, and I do not see how that affects the case.

MR. BYLES: I only wanted the information.

MR. WEDGWOOD (Newcastle-under-Lyme): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that white people are not allowed to work with other people in the public streets, and cannot that arrangement be extended to British Indians?

COLONEL SEELY: I will inquire.

The Charges against Dinizulu.

MR. MACKARNESS (Berkshire, Newbury): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Colonial Office is yet in possession of information enabling him to state upon what charges Dinizulu has been indicted and which of the charges for which he was arrested have not been proceeded with.

COLONEL SEELY: Yes, Sir; the full text of the indictment will appear in a Parliamentary Paper which is being presented to-day and should be in the hands of Members this evening.

Colonial Immigration Laws.

MR. CATHCART WASON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will cause to be circulated by the Immigration Office particulars of the disabilities imposed on British immigrants by certain of the Colonies.

COLONEL SEELY: Full information as to the restrictions on immigration into the self-governing Colonies is given in the Circulars relating to those Colonies issued by the Emigrants' Information Office. The Circulars are issued free of cost. Considerably over 300,000 of them are distributed in the course of a year.

Consular Reports on Industrial Development.

MR. WEDGWOOD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to a Report by Sir F. Offenheimer, Consul General at Frankfort, on the industrial development of Germany in connection with trusts and syndicates; whether any extra remuneration is granted to Consuls issuing specially elaborate Reports of this nature; and whether Reports modelled on these lines could be obtained from our Consuls in other European and American countries.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. McKinnon Wood, Glasgow, St. Rollox): The Answer to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative, and to the second part in the negative. As regards the last part of the Question, the attention of His Majesty's Diplomatic representatives and Consular Officers at important posts abroad will be directed to the suggestion, and they will be invited to furnish from time to time such information on those lines as circumstances will permit.

MR. WEDGWOOD: May I ask whether the out-of-pocket expenses incurred by Consuls in collecting statistics are defrayed?

MR. McKINNON WOOD: I am not aware that there have been any out-of-pocket expenses.

MR. H. C. LEA (St. Pancras, E.) asked if instructions would be given to Consuls in various European countries where protection obtains to get comparative prices.

[No Answer was returned.]

The Lado Enclave—Destruction of Elephants.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if his attention has been called to the condition of affairs existing in the Lado enclave, forming part of our Central African Possessions; if the troops of the Congo Free State have been withdrawn from the territory, and during the absence of authority the elephants are being destroyed wholesale by white adventurers.

MR. McKINNON WOOD: We have seen allusions in the Press to the situation to which the hon. Member refers. The Lado enclave is a part of the Soudan, and not of the British Central African Possessions; it is in the occupation of His Majesty King Leopold II. under the Agreement between Great Britain and the Independent State of the Congo of 9th May, 1906. We are unable to make any statement as to the movements of Congolese troops in the enclave, but inquiries will be made as to the truth of the reports respecting the destruction of elephants there.

MR. FELL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if the lease of the Lado enclave to His Majesty the King of the Belgians is still in force; if the withdrawal of the troops of the Congo Free State from the enclave and the leaving of the enclave without responsible government is in accordance with the terms of the lease; and whether, seeing that the destruction of the herds of elephants there by the lessee or his agents will cause injury to the enclave, he will say what steps he proposes to take under the circumstances.

MR. MCKINNON WOOD: Until the discussions between His Majesty's Government and the Belgian Government as to the conditions on which Great Britain will recognise the transfer of the Congo State to Belgium are concluded, the Agreements of May 9th, 1906, under which the Lado enclave is leased to His Majesty King Leopold II. remains effective. There is nothing in the terms of that Agreement affecting the movements of troops or other administrative questions in the Lado enclave. It may be stated that the Government of the Congo State ratified the International African Game Convention of May, 1900, though they did not undertake to be bound by its terms till the ratifications of all the other signatory Powers had been received. We are, however, confident that the Congo Government, acting in the spirit of the Convention, will arrest any wanton or wholesale destruction of elephants in the Lado enclave, should the reports as to such slaughter prove to be accurate, and we are instructing His Majesty's Minister at Brussels to make representations accordingly.

MR. FELL: Is it a fact that, pending the discussion now going on, this is a kind of No Man's Land, and that adventurers are now shooting elephants by the thousand?

MR. MCKINNON WOOD: I do not know that you can call it a No Man's Land. It is leased to the King of the Belgians, and I hope that the position to which the hon. Member refers is only a temporary one.

Old-Age Pensions—Claimants over Seventy Years of Age.

MR. TIMOTHY DAVIES (Fulham): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can state the number of persons over seventy years of age in England, Wales (including Monmouthshire), Scotland, and Ireland; whether he can give the number of such persons in receipt of poor law relief in each part of the Kingdom; the number of claims for old-age pensions up to date; and the percentage of persons claiming old-age pensions to the population over seventy years of age in each country, deducting those who are in receipt of poor law relief.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): The number of persons over seventy years of age in the United Kingdom in 1908 is estimated at 898,000, in England (excluding Monmouthshire); 59,000 in Wales (including Monmouthshire); 134,000 in Scotland; and 184,000 in Ireland. Of these it is estimated that approximately 220,000 are in receipt of poor law relief in England, 16,000 in Wales (including Monmouthshire), 19,000 in Scotland, and 32,000 in Ireland. Applications for old-age pensions have been received (up to the 21st instant) from 367,197 persons in England; 23,960 in Wales, 68,785 in Scotland, and 193,138 in Ireland. The percentage of the persons claiming old-age pensions to the population over seventy years of age, after deducting those in receipt of poor law relief, is therefore, on the basis of the figures quoted above:—In England 54 per cent., in Wales 56 per cent., in Scotland 60 per cent., and Ireland 128 per cent.

Married Women and Old-Age Pensions.

MR. ROGERS (Wiltshire, Devizes): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in the event of a local pensions committee deciding to grant a pension to a married woman whose husband is in receipt of poor law relief, the pension officer will be instructed to appeal.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: In such cases, as explained by my right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board on the 26th instant, the wife will be disqualified only if relief is given to her direct, or to her husband for her on her account. In any case in which a married woman to whom a pension is granted appears to be subject to this disqualification, the pension officer will be instructed to appeal against the award.

Unestablished Service and Pensions.

MR. CROOKS: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware of the number of men in the various Government offices who are promoted to the establishment for meritorious work and conduct, and who, nevertheless, are unable to count the whole unestablished service towards pension; and whether he will take steps to remove this hardship.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The proportion of previous unestablished service (if any) which a person promoted to the establishment is allowed to count for pension depends upon the terms upon which he is promoted. The permission to count any part of such service is a special privilege, refusal of which cannot in my opinion properly be described as a hardship, and I cannot undertake to extend still further the very liberal concessions which have been made in this direction of recent years.

Old-Age Pensions Regulations.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, for the convenience of the Irish-speaking population in Ireland, he will cause copies of the Old-Age Pensions Act, and copies of the forms and regulations appertaining thereto, to be printed in Irish.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I understand that no difficulty has been experienced by pension officers in Ireland in regard to the language question. Should any case of hardship be brought to my notice, I should be very glad to make the necessary arrangements to deal with it.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: Is the right hon. Gentleman thinking of printing the regulations in any other language than English—Welsh, for instance?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have already explained to hon. Members for Scotland that if any grievance is brought to my notice I am ready to print the regulations in any language.

Unredeemed Banknotes.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can state the total value of notes issued by the Bank of England in 1867, and the total value presented for payment; whether the £14,055 written off on account of notes issued in that year is the total value, or only part value, of those not since presented; and whether the State receives any portion of such moneys, or whether they are all annexed by the Bank from year to year.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am informed by the Bank of England that after this lapse of time it is difficult to ascertain the exact value of the notes issued to the public during 1867, but that it appears to have been about £330,000,000. Of this total, all but £14,515 have been paid. The amount of £14,055 recently written off comprises the outstanding notes for £14,515, less a sum of £460, representing notes which have been written off in previous years but have been presented and paid during the current year. The Bank remains liable, under Section 6 of the Bank Act, 1892, to pay written-off notes, if presented for payment; and the State has no claim to any portion of the value of such notes.

MR. MACVEAGH: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will also get the figures of the value of notes not presented to the Bank of Scotland, the Bank of Ireland, and the other joint stock banks of the United Kingdom?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I will consider that.

Privilege Cabs at Woolwich Arsenal Station.

MR. CROOKS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will inquire of the Woolwich police as to the working of the privilege cab system at the Arsenal Station; whether it would be in the interest of the travelling public to declare the station an open one; and whether friction is caused by the privileged cabman taking the outside stand in addition to the privilege stand.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): I am making the inquiry suggested in the first part of the hon. Member's Question, and if he will permit me, I will defer my reply to the second and third part until it has been completed.

The Treatment of Suffragist Prisoners.

SIR WILLIAM BULL (Hammer-smith): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details as to the prison treatment of woman suffragists committed in default of providing sureties for good behaviour, under the heads: prison uniform, dietary, correspondence, visits, exercises, association, remission of sentences, and punishments.

MR. GLADSTONE: The suffragist prisoners, like other second division female prisoners, wear a distinctive dress. Their diet is that prescribed for the second division by the rules for local prisoners made on the 2nd September, 1901, under the Prisons Act, 1898, the items of which are fully set out in the rules, with such additions or alterations as may be prescribed by the medical officer in individual cases. When the sentence exceeds one month, they may write and receive a letter and a visit once a month, and special letters and visits are allowed to all prisoners in connection with matters of urgent business. They are allowed to exercise for one hour daily, and to work in association for a time daily whenever associated labour can be arranged. In common with all prisoners, they can earn a remission of one-sixth of their sentences by good conduct and industry, if they are sentenced to more than one month's imprisonment. They are subject to the ordinary Prison Rules (number 78, and following of the Rules for local Prisons) as to punishment for misconduct.

The Press and Coroners' Courts.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether he is aware that, at an inquest held at the coroner's Court of St. Giles's, London, on the 21st inst., the coroner's officer refused to admit the representatives of three news agencies and numerous daily papers, whilst admitting two journalists; whether he is aware that a written protest handed to the coroner's officer was not delivered to the coroner, and will he say what notice has been taken of the incident; and what steps have been or will be taken, by legislation or otherwise, to prevent its repetition in that or any other coroner's Court.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am informed by the coroner that the exclusion of a certain number of Press representatives, who had arrived late, was due to a misunderstanding arising from instructions given to prevent overcrowding in the court-room, which is a very small one. It appears that four journalists were present during the proceedings. The question of what persons should be admitted to the inquest was entirely in the discretion of the coroner, who informs me that the Courts over which he presides are always open to the public and to the Press, so far as the accommodation will allow. The incident does not appear to me to call for any further action.

MR. BYLES: May the House understand that the coroner's Court is a public Court, and that no coroner has a right to pick and choose between the representatives of the Press?

MR. GLADSTONE: Of course I am not responsible for the coroner's action, but I take it that they are admitted as long as there is room.

MR. BYLES: Is the coroner's Court everywhere a public Court, and has any coroner a right to pick and choose?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is a public Court under the control of the coroner, who has to make the best arrangements he can for the public interest.

MR. BYLES: It is most important that the House should know——

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. If the Question is so important the hon. Member had better give notice.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: Has the right hon. Gentleman received any expression of regret from the coroner, or any assurance that this will not be repeated?

MR. GLADSTONE: As will be gathered from the Answer already given, the coroner has said that his Court was open to the public and the Press so far as the accommodation would allow. I have received no further communication.

Chelmsford Election Disturbances.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can now state the result of his inquiries into the disorderly scenes connected with the bye-election in Chelmsford and the injuries inflicted upon the Liberal agent.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am informed that on the evening of the 25th inst. the police sergeant stationed at Ingatestone was asked to send some constables to the working men's club the same evening to assist in keeping order. He replied that keeping order at the meeting was a matter for the stewards, and that he could not go into the hall. He was outside the hall with two constables at the time of the assault, and did not witness it, nor was he called on by anyone to assist in preventing violence. The first time Mr. Martin came outside the hall he mentioned the violence to which he had been subjected, but could not give the names of his assailants. Afterwards when Mr. Martin had returned to the hall and fainted, the police took him to his lodgings on a stretcher. I have no reason to suppose that the police have in any way failed in their duty in respect of the disorderly and reprehensible incidents arising from the Chelmsford election.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD: Am I to understand from that Answer that Mr. Martin was seriously injured, or were the reports exaggerated?

MR. GLADSTONE: It appears that Mr. Martin was seriously injured, but the last report I received on Saturday evening gave, I am glad to say, a favourable account of his condition.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is within his knowledge that different police forces in the country take different views of their duties with regard to preserving order within public meetings; and whether he does not think that it might be well to appoint a committee, not necessarily a Parliamentary committee, of some kind to inquire as to the conduct of the police in general, without reflecting on any particular police force, and to lay down what should be the duty of the police with regard to keeping order in public meetings?

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman is quite correct. The practice varies in different localities, and I will consider the suggestion he has made that an inquiry should be instituted.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the advisability of drafting extra police in order to preserve order in this disturbed district?

MR. WARDLE (Stockport): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the question of the powers of watch committees with regard to the police as a whole?

MR. GLADSTONE: That is a general question. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give notice.

MR. CORRIE GRANT (Rugby): Will the right hon. Gentleman circulate with the Votes a copy of the report he has received from the Home Office experts as to the state of Mr. Martin's health; there are so many different reports?

MR. GLADSTONE: I really do not know to what my hon. friend alludes, unless it is a report in the newspapers. Obviously no Home Office expert has gone down with regard to Mr. Martin's health.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in certain public meetings recently held the superintendent of police in districts where disturbances were anticipated has entered the hall and closed the meeting?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, instances of that sort do occur, and I have said that there is a variety of practice.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: Why not apply to the Irish Secretary to send some of his police to this disturbed district.

Dangerous Performances on the Stage.

MR. CATHCART WASON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been directed to the recent case of manslaughter on the stage; and if he will take into consideration the desirability of prohibiting all public performances involving danger to men, women, children, and animals.

MR. GLADSTONE: I presume the hon. Member refers to the unfortunate accident which occurred last Monday night at the Middlesex Music Hall, and which resulted in the death of a man who was hit by a rifle bullet in the course of a stage performance. The jury brought in a verdict, not of manslaughter, but of accidental death. The performance is, in my opinion, reprehensible, and ought not to have been allowed by those responsible for it. I am communicating with the London County Council on the subject.

MR. H. C. LEA: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that two years ago I put a Question to him on this subject of prohibiting performances of this character, and he rather gave me to understand that he would appoint a Departmental Committee to inquire into the subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir, I hinted at legislation. A Bill was prepared, and, I think, introduced, but its reception was so extremely unfavourable that the Bill has not been heard of since.

MR. H. C. LEA: In view of the altered opinion of this House, would the right hon. Gentleman bring it in again?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not at all sure that the opinion of the House has altered.

The "All-Red" Route.

MR. FELL: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if any progress has been made toward the establishment of the All-Red Route, and if any statement on the matter will be made during the present session.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. CHURCHILL, Dundee): As has been already stated by my hon. friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, the informal Committee who are investigating this question are considering an Interim Report, but it is unlikely that any statement on the matter will be made during the present session.

MR. FELL: Has any progress really been made towards the establishment of the All-Red Route, beyond getting this Report?

MR. CHURCHILL: I have nothing to add to my Answer.

Foreign Prison-Made Goods.

MR. C. B. HARMSWORTH (Worcestershire, Droitwich): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that foreign prison-made carpets are imported into this country; and what steps are being taken by the Board of Trade to give effect in the case of carpets to the provisions of the Foreign Prison-Made Goods Acts of 1897.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Board of Trade are not aware of any importations of the nature referred to by my hon. friend. In order to enable action to be taken in a case of this kind, it is necessary for the Commissioners of His Majesty's Customs to be furnished by the complainant with satisfactory proof that the articles in question were actually manufactured in prison.

North British Railway Company and their Employees.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can now state the result of his conference with the directors of the North British Railway Company as to their action in compelling six of their employees to withdraw from the Ladybank (Fife) Town Council.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Board of Trade have been in communication with the North British Railway Company on this subject and have received the following reply from the general manager:—"Dear Sir Hudson, With reference to our conversation at the Conference yesterday as to Mr. Keir Hardie's question regarding employees of this Company as town councillors of Ladybank, I beg to say that this Company has not, nor has it ever had, any rule or regulation which prevents their employees from being members of the town councils. To look no further than the case of Ladybank itself, Ladybank has been a burgh since 1876, and from that date servants of this Company have been continuously members of the town council. The company has no intention to enforce any restriction upon its employees to prevent them serving on town councils so long as such service is not inconsistent with their duty to the Company.—I am, etc., (signed) W. F. Jackson."

Sir Hudson Kearley, Bart., M.P.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: But is the right hon. Gentleman aware that six of the employees of this company have been compelled to resign their seats on the Ladybank Town Council, owing to the action of the company? Is there any guarantee there will be no repetition of that in the future?

MR. CHURCHILL: I think the letter I have just read is the guarantee.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: Has the general manager of this railway in any way explained why these six men were obliged to withdraw from the town council? Is it alleged the meetings of the council would interfere with their duties to the company?

MR. CHURCHILL: I cannot carry all the details in my head. I will make inquiry, but I think that probably the explanation is that it was felt their work on the council would be prejudicial to the discharge of their duty to the company.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the men have served on the council for years without complaint, and it was only when a dispute arose with the town clerk, who is solicitor to the railway company, that they were compelled to withdraw?

[No Answer was returned.]

MR. H. C. LEA: Is there not a Bill affecting this company coming on to—night? Will the right hon. Gentleman telegraph to the general manager for an explanation with regard to the case of these men, and get a reply before the Bill is taken?

MR. CHURCHILL: I will endeavour to get all the information I can.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): Has the question of the Ladybank Town Council any relation to the Bill coming before the House?

[No Answer was returned.]

Old-Age Pensions Disqualifications.

SIR G. KEKEWICH (Exeter): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, when a son contributes to the maintenance of his father, and the contribution is paid through the guardians, that sum is regarded as poor relief, so as to debar the father from receiving an old-age pension, although he has not cost the poor rate anything.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): I think I can only say generally that where a son or other relative of a poor person repays to the guardians, whether in whole or in part, the sums given by the guardians to that person, the repayment does not, as I am advised, remove the disqualification for an old-age pension. Where the payment to the guardians by the relative is not by way of reimbursement in respect of relief given by them to the poor person but by way of voluntary contribution to his maintenance, the facts of the particular case would have to be ascertained before an opinion could be expressed with regard to it.

MR. BELLOC (Salford, S.): Are we to understand that there can exist a case in which a man has cost the public nothing, and yet he is debarred from his old-age pension?

MR. JOHN BURNS: Probably, yes.

MR. BELLOC: Well, it ought not to be.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: In the cases which not infrequently occur where several children are willing, contribute to the support of their parent, but it is necessary to get the board of guardians to enforce payment in order to bring in one outstanding son or daughter who will not do his or her duty, and where in that way the contribution is made through the board of guardians, is the old person really to be disqualified although no part of his cost has fallen upon the rates?

MR. JOHN BURNS: That particular case has not been remitted to the Law Officers. If the right hon. Member will send it on I shall have much pleasure in sending it to the Law Officers.

MR. KEIR HARDIE asked whether disqualification in cases of this kind was by the Act itself or by a regulation of the Local Government Board.

MR. JOHN BURNS said it had been laid down in previous decisions that in a case where, in anticipation of a person becoming chargeable to the guardians, his son or daughter used the guardians as the medium of paying money for his or her maintenance, the disqualification would not apply, as there was no Poor Law relief given.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman could not get over this difficulty by getting the Chancellor of the Exchequer to issue a new secret instruction.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I do not think it would be improved upon if one were issued.

Notification of Consumption.

MR. VIVIAN (Birkenhead): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can see his way in the proposed legislation for making compulsory the notification of consumption in the case of paupers to extend the proposal of compulsory notification to all cases of consumption.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I do not contemplate legislation on this subject at the present time. The action I propose to take as regards the notification of consumption in poor law cases will be taken under the existing powers of the Local Government Board, and must, I think, be limited to such cases.

Liverpool Distress Relief Works.

MR. McARTHUR (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the Liverpool Distress Committee, having practically exhausted their funds, have announced that they will be compelled on Tuesday next to discharge 380 men now employed by them on relief works; and, if so, whether it is his intention to respond to the appeal of the committee for a grant-in-aid to prevent the collapse of their work and the consequences which would be involved in throwing so many men out of employment.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I am to-day making a payment of £1,000 to the distress committee from the Parliamentary grant. I am glad to be able to add that, since the hon. Member gave notice of his Question, the immediate pressure upon the distress committee has already been relieved, as they have received additional funds from public subscriptions amounting to £1,250.

Local Loans.

MR. O'GRADY (Leeds, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will state how many applications for sanction of loans are now under the consideration of his Board, and what is the amount involved; and whether he can say approximately what time will elapse before his Board will have come to a decision respecting the applications.

MR. JOHN BURNS: The information asked for in the first part of the Question is not readily available, and could only be obtained after an examination of several hundred files of papers, which would involve much time and labour. Nor is it possible to give a definite reply to the latter part of the Question; the time which must necessarily elapse before a decision can be arrived at with respect to a particular application depends largely on the complexity of the matter to which it relates and the sufficiency of the information supplied in connection with it.

Telegraphic Communication with the Orkneys.

MR. CATHCART WASON: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he has received the account of the total wreck of the "Isle of Erin," and the loss of many valuable lives, given by the lighthouse keeper, North Ronaldshay, Orkney, suggesting that if there had been telegraphic communication the ship and crew might have been saved; and if he will take the earliest possible opportunity of extending the telegraphic system to North Ronaldshay, taking into account the irregularity of the mail delivery and the difficulties of obtaining medical aid of any sort, and the number of people on the island.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I have seen an account of the wreck and the suggestion to which the hon. Member refers. I informed my hon. friend in March, 1906, that I could not provide the telegraph extension to North Ronaldshay because the cost would be prohibitive, as compared with the revenue. I am considering whether I could undertake it on special terms of guarantee.

Adult Night Messengers in the Post Office.

MR. O'GRADY: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he is aware that the recommendation of the Select Committee meant that all full time adult night messengers were to be placed upon the establishment irrespective of the age limit, the intention of the Committee being that these men should obtain the benefit of a small retiring pension; and whether he will arrange that in exceptional cases the messengers will be appointed under Clause VII. of the Order in Council of the 4th June, 1870, as was done in the case of the established telegraphists at the Central Telegraph Office.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The Committee's recommendation was that "any full time messenger who has been employed for five years and can obtain a Civil Service certificate should be placed on the establishment," and this is being done. The unestablished telegraphists at the Central Telegraph Office were in the same way required to obtain Civil Service certificates before appointment.

The Mall Improvement.

MR. HART-DAVIES (Hackney, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether it is intended to construct a roadway between the Mall and Birdcage Walk, or only to widen the existing footway.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. L. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rossendale): It is only intended to widen the existing footpath for a short distance behind the new gates.

Grants to Roman Catholic Schools.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education what would have been the total sum payable to the Association of Roman Catholic Schools in the last year for which figures are available if the present Education Bill had then been in force and if all Catholic schools in England and Wales had joined such an association; and what sum per child in average attendance this total represents.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. TREVELYAN, Yorkshire, W.R., Elland): Excluding schools which would not be eligible to contract out under Clause 3 of the Bill, the total sum payable would be, approximately, £705,000, representing an average of about 49s. 7d. per child in average attendance.

Royal College of Science, London.

MR. GWYNN (Galway): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the teaching staff of the Royal College of Science, London, received substantial additions to income and exceptional pension privileges on the transfer of the administration of that college to the Imperial College of Science and Technology in January last; whether he can state on what principle the Treasury has acted in awarding these special terms; and if the principle is applicable to professors in Irish colleges under similar circumstances.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HOBHOUSE, Bristol, E.): On the transfer of the Royal College of Science to the governing body of the Imperial College the salaries of the teaching staff ceased to be payable directly out of public funds and I have therefore no information in respect of them. The Treasury, however, under the powers conferred upon them by the Superannuation Acts, agreed to award to these gentlemen compensation allowances and gratuities where justified by length of service, on the abolition of their offices under the Board of Education. The compensation of officers transferred from Irish Colleges is provided for in Section 16 of the Irish Universities Act, and in this connection I beg to refer the hon. Member to my reply of the 4th May last to the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge University.

MR. GWYNN: Am I to understand that the same principle applies to both England and Ireland when a college is transferred from Civil Service status to an outside status?

MR. HOBHOUSE: So far as the provisions of the Irish University Act admit, yes.

Second Division Clerks.

MR. S. COLLINS (Lambeth, Kennington): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the higher salaries prescribed by the Order in Council of 21st December, 1907, were afforded to second division clerks on the ground that their salaries under the Order in Council of 21st March, 1890, were inadequate during the earlier years of service; and, if so, will he explain why the lower salaries under the latter Order in Council, to which second division clerks in the Estate Duty Office are required to revert on promotion to the first division, are considered sufficient to enable these clerks to support themselves in their higher states.

MR. HOBHOUSE: The Answer to the first part of the Question is in the negative, and the second part does not therefore arise.

MR. S. COLLINS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, seeing that it is usual for a clerk upon promotion to be given the prospect of a higher maximum salary as well as to receive an immediate increase of pay, he will explain why, in the case of second division clerks in the Estate Duty Office promoted to the first division, the conferring of a higher maximum is to be accompanied by a substantial reduction of salary.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I would refer my hon. friend to previous replies which I have given on this subject on 10th November and 13th July, 1908.

Estate Duty Office Clerks.

MR. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, seeing that the second division clerks in the Estate Duty Office, London, affected by the Order in Council of 21st December, 1907, elected to have their salaries re-adjusted thereunder before any question of promotion was brought to their notice, and seeing that the promotion of the clerks in question is to be by selection on the grounds of special competency and merit, such selection not having yet been made, the question has not at present arisen with regard to any individual clerk, he will state the reasons why specially selected clerks in the Estate Duty Office are to be required under that Order to enter the first division at a salary less than their readjusted salaries, while this was not made a condition in the case of the clerks of the Admiralty recently promoted, and whether it is to be understood that the chronological accident that one scheme ante-dated the other in its conception, though post-dating it in execution, is the sole reason for distinguishing the men to be promoted in the Estate Duty Office from those already promoted in the Admiralty.

MR. HOBHOUSE: As regards the promotion of second division clerks the circumstances in the Estate Duty Office are different from those in the Admiralty. The Estate Duty Office is undergoing a reorganisation, which would have involved the disappearance of the second division staff if the present course had not been taken. Promotion is different from the mode adopted in the Admiralty, where there has been no general decision to make promotions, and a particular clerk is only promoted on the ground of exceptional merit.

MR. CARLILE: Why is there the difference of treatment between the two classes?

MR. HOBHOUSE: The circumstances in the one case are considered greatly superior to those in the other.

Commissioners of Woods and Forests and Small Holdings.

MR. ROGERS (Wiltshire, Devizes): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somersetshire, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether the Commissioners of Woods and Forests will make it a practice in the future to give the first offer of all vacant farms in their possession to the small holdings committee of the county in which they are situate.

THE TREASURER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Sir EDWARD STRACHEY, Somersetshire, S.): Yes, but with due regard of course to the circumstances of each case.

The Board of Agriculture.

MR. T. F. RICHARDS: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somersetshire, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he could recommend an early meeting of the Board of Agriculture to take into consideration the urgent necessity for pressing forward in all counties where applications have been made the best means to meet the requirements of the Small Holdings and Allotments Act.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY: The President does not propose to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend, as he does not think that any useful purpose would be thereby served.

Secondary Schools in Scotland.

MR. MENZIES (Lanarkshire, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland why the statement of income, expenditure, and liabilities of secondary schools for the year 1905-6, given in Table I., page 953, of the Report of the Committee on Education in Scotland for 1907-8, is only for that date; why that table and the various other particulars of secondary education in Scotland given in that Report up to page 1013, inclusive, do not include all details of these schools and their expenditure up to and including 15th May, 1908, seeing that these details were necessarily in the hands of the Department since the latter date; and whether he will endeavour to print and circulate these as a separate paper at the earliest opportunity.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): The statement of income, expenditure, and liabilities of secondary schools for the year 1906-7 (being the latest audited accounts available), were included in a separate Paper (Cd. 4310) issued on 19th September last. The other particulars referred to by the hon. Member (the latest available) will also be found in this Paper.

Drumkeerin Evicted Tenant.

MR. F. MEEHAN (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have yet taken any action with a view of reinstating Peter D. Kelly, an evicted tenant on the West estate, Drumkeerin, County Leitrim, who returned from America with the hope of being reinstated and is still remaining in Ireland awaiting the decision of the Commission.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): The Estates Commissioners inform me that Kelly's application is being considered in connection with the allotment of untenanted land which they are acquiring.

The King-Harman Estate.

MR. JAMES O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that in November, 1903, terms of purchase were agreed upon between the vendor of the King-Harman estate situated in the counties of Roscommon and Sligo, and the tenants on the same; that one of the conditions agreed to by the vendor was that the Estates Commissioners be requested to purchase the whole estate with a view to secure the turbary for the tenants; that previous to the sale the landlord exercised the power of letting the turbary rights to the tenants, even where the bogs upon the estate were within the boundaries of the farms of certain individual tenants, charging the latter with rent for cutting turf in the bogs on the

the same way as he charged rent to the occupiers of outlying farms in the district; that the Estates Commissioners at the time of the sale recognised the rights of the occupiers as a body to turbary rights on the estate by vesting the bogs which had been held direct by the landlord in trustees for the benefit of the said occupiers; that one of the former tenants upon whose holding there was a large tract of bog which, previous to the sale, had been, according to the custom of the estate, let off as turbary from year to year to a number of tenants in the district, denied all access after the sale to the bog in question to the former users, save at enormous rentals; and whether, seeing that this action causes loss and inconvenience to about 200 families resident in the district, and that a decision in favour of the former users was given by the Judicial Commissioners, but was reversed upon a technical point by the Court of Appeal in February of this year, he will, in his amending Act, introduce a clause restoring to the 200 occupiers in question their former rights of turbary and making the Act of 1903 clear upon the point involved in this case.

MR. BIRRELL: This estate was purchased by the Estates Commissioners in 1905. The landlord had in his own hands certain bogs, containing in all 1,308 acres, and these have been vested in trustees for the benefit of the tenant purchasers. He also had the right to empower persons to take turf, on payment to him of a bog rent, from other bogs lying within the boundaries of certain holdings on the estate, the tenants of these holdings having the right of turbary for their own use only. The Commissioners were asked to make regulations authorising the taking of turf on these bogs, but the Court of Appeal decided that the Commissioners had no power to make such regulations, as the holdings had been vested in the purchasers without any reservation of turbary. I do not think it would be possible to introduce a clause into the Land Bill for the purpose suggested in the last paragraph of the Question.

Waterville (Kerry) Road Scheme.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-

Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that an inspection has been made by the Congested Districts Board of the proposed road between Cahersivane and Clogvoola, near Waterville, County Kerry; and can he state when the Board will be prepared to construct this road.

MR. BIRRELL: The proposed road was inspected in September, 1907, by the engineer of the Congested Districts Board, who reported that only seven families would derive much benefit from it, and that it would probably cost considerably more than £600. The Board decided in December last that, if the county authorities agreed to undertake the work, they would consider what contribution they could make. They are not prepared to construct the road themselves.

Tuberculosis Prevention (Ireland) Bill.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when he proposes to take the Report stage of the Tuberculosis Prevention (Ireland) Bill; and will he give adequate time for its full discussion on Report.

MR. BIRRELL: Having regard to the expressions of opinion which have reached me from hon. Members from Ireland sitting both above and below the gangway, the only chance of the Bill becoming law this session seems to depend upon the acceptance of an Amendment making the adoption of the provisions of the Bill as to compulsory notification optional with each local authority. Personally, I think the Bill, even subject to this condition, worth saving, but the matter is under consideration.

Branchfield Grazing Farm, Sligo.

MR. O'DOWD (Sligo, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Branchfield grazing farm situate near Coolaney, County Sligo, and held in fee by Mr. McKim, 3, Carnew Street, South Circular Road, Dublin, has been offered for sale to the Estates Commissioners; whether an inspector has been sent to value this farm, and, if so, what is the nature of his report; will a sale of this farm take place; and, if so, will he state whether the claims of the sub-tenants on this estate, whose average valuations do not exceed £3 10s. will receive first consideration in the event of the distribution of this ranch for the relief of congestion.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners inform me that these lands have been inspected, but Mr. McKim's interest therein does not appear to be sufficient to enable him to sell the lands under the Land Purchase Acts.

Ballinaraw Evicted Tenant.

Mr. O'DOWD: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, seeing that the Estates Commissioners have decided that Richard Foy, whose father was evicted from a farm in Ballinaraw, Bunninadden, County Sligo, is a fit person to be provided with a holding, will he say what steps, if any, are being taken to have him so provided.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have referred this case to their inspector, with a view to providing the applicant with a holding.

Rathmagurra Evicted Tenant.

Mr. O'DOWD: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will explain the cause of the delay in the reinstatement of Pat Kilroy, of Rathmagurra, near Curry, County Sligo, who was evicted from his farm on the Knox estate on 9th June, 1902; and whether, seeing that the tenant in occupation is now and has for some time past been prepared to accept the terms of compensation, namely £50, offered by the Estates Commissioners for surrendering this farm, steps will immediately be taken to have the evicted tenant reinstated.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners inform me that this case is under consideration, but, as they are at present advised, there appears to be a legal difficulty about their acquiring the holding under the Evicted Tenants Act. Further inquiries will be made.

Land Purchase in County Armagh.

Mr. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the number of purchase agreements under the Irish Land Act, 1903, lodged with the Estates Commissioners up to 31st October last from the County of Armagh, with the total number of advances applied for in connection with these agreements, the number of agreements from Armagh completed, and the total amount actually advanced at the date named.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners inform me that up to 31st October last, agreements for the purchase of 13,505 holdings in County Armagh had been lodged, representing a purchase money of £2,629,181. Of this amount there had been advanced on that date £848,903 for the purchase of 3,484 holdings.

Turbary on the King-Harman Estate.

Mr. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the total area of the turbary on the King-Harman estate, County Roscommon, vested in trustees for the benefit of the tenants, and what is the area of bog on the holding of G. Acheson, who was decided by the Court of Appeal to be entitled to the exclusive right to turbary on the holding sold to him by the Estates Commissioners, to the exclusion of some persons who had previously cut turf thereon under annual permits from the landlord; and what was the average number of the persons allowed to cut on the bog on Acheson's farm.

Mr. BIRRELL: With regard to the turbary on this estate, I would refer the hon. Member to the answer given to a Question by the hon. Member for North Down. The area of bogs vested in trustees for the benefit of the tenants is 163 acres. George Acheson's farm comprises 163 acres, a considerable area of which is bog. The Estates Commissioners inform me that the vendor for the benefit of forty persons to take bog, about one-third of the estate, being tenants on the estate.

Shannon Bridge at Portumna.

MR. REDDY (King's County, Birr): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to an inquiry relative to the necessity of building a new bridge across the Shannon, at Portumna, between the county of Galway and county of Tipperary, or repairing the existing bridge and thus avoiding a considerable amount of expense; whether he is aware that one of the members of the Commission sitting to decide the question is Mr. John Ouseley Moynan, county surveyor, of North Tipperary, who has already drawn up and furnished to the County Council of North Tipperary a Report dated March, 1908, in which he insists on the absolute necessity of building a new bridge as aforesaid; that the majority of the Commission, as at present constituted, are paid officers of County Tipperary and County Galway, being the counties primarily responsible for the cost of a new bridge (if any); and will he say whether such majority will have the power of imposing part of the expense of erecting such new bridge on neighbouring counties such as Clare, Limerick, King's and Queen's, who have no representatives on the Commission.

MR. BIRRELL: A Commission has been appointed at the request of the County Council of North Tipperary to consider the question of building a new bridge at Portumna, the county surveyor having reported that the existing bridge is in a dangerous condition. The county surveyors of the North and South Ridings of Tipperary and of the East Riding of Galway have been placed on the Commission, the other members being Mr. Doyle, K.C., chairman, and Mr. Griffith, engineer to the Dublin Port and Docks Board. The Statute under which the Commission was appointed limits the number to five. It was, therefore, impossible to include representatives of all the counties mentioned in the Question, and an equitable selection has been made. It is one of the duties of the Commission to recommend the area of charge, but any county dissatisfied with such recommendation can appeal to the Lord-Lieutenant in Council.

Loughrea Police.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether all the land in the neighbourhood of Kilreck, Loughrea, has been sold to the tenants through the Estates Commissioners; whether the district is perfectly crimeless; and whether the Government will consider the propriety of reducing the number of policemen in the district to a normal level.

MR. BIRRELL: The Inspector-General of the Royal Irish Constabulary informs me that more than one property in the neighbourhood of Kilreck is still unsold. The two extra policemen who are stationed at Kilreck are still required for the protection of person and the prevention of cattle-driving, and it would be premature at present to consider the question of withdrawing them.

Whyte Blake Estate, Loughrea.

MR. DUFFY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that agreements to purchase their residential holdings, have been signed by the tenants on the Whyte Blake estate, Holly Park Loughrea; whether the Estates Commissioners have already distributed the untenanted lands of the estate amongst the small holders; whether the tenants on most of the neighbouring estates are similarly circumstanced; and can he state when it is proposed to disband the military garrison stationed in the middle of the estate.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners inform me that the tenanted lands on this estate have been sold by the landlord to the tenants. The offer of the Commissioners for the purchase of the untenanted land has been accepted and a scheme for its allotment is being prepared. There are, however, other circumstances connected with the locality which render the retention of the extra police absolutely necessary. I am not aware of any military garrison in the district.

Surety Prisoners in Irish Gaols.

SIR WILLIAM BULL (Hammer-smith): I beg to ask the Chief

Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can give details as to the prison treatment of persons committed in default of providing sureties for good behaviour for the offence of cattle-driving, under the heads : Prison uniform, dietary, correspondence, visits, exercises ; association ; remission of sentences ; and punishments.

MR. BIRRELL : Prisoners of the class referred to in the Question are treated in Ireland as untried prisoners. For the special rules governing their treatment I would refer the hon. Member to the Rules for Ordinary Prisons in Ireland, published as Parliamentary Papers in 1902 (H.C. Papers 129 and 189 of 1902). The details could not well be compressed within the limits of an oral Answer.

Irish Poor Law Returns.

MR. KAVANAGH (Carlow) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that several officers of Poor Law unions in Ireland have applied for remuneration for the preparation of Returns which they were required to furnish by sealed order of the Local Government Board for the purposes of the English Royal Commission on Poor Law ; whether such application has been refused by the Treasury ; and whether, in consequence, such expenses have to be paid out of the local rates.

MR. BIRRELL : I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to a Question on the same subject asked by the hon. Member for South Wexford on the 26th instant.

Deportation of Paupers to Ireland.

MR. KAVANAGH : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that paupers can be deported from Great Britain to Ireland on magistrates' warrants, to be supported and maintained by Irish ratepayers ; whether he is aware that such a case has recently occurred in Carlow, where a pauper has been sent from England to the Carlow workhouse, giving his birthplace as Leighlinbridge, whereas no one of the name has ever been known in the locality ; and whether he will instruct magistrates in this country to make more investigation before issuing a warrant for deportation.

MR. BIRRELL : My attention has been called to the case referred to. As I have stated on previous occasions the question of amending the law regarding the removal of paupers will be considered when legislation is being introduced for the reform of the Poor Law. I have no power to give instructions to magistrates in England or Scotland.

Sligo, Leitrim, and Northern Counties Railway.

MR. F. MEEHAN : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, seeing that in the Public Works Loan Bill introduced by the Government in last session of Parliament provisions were made for a free grant of £32,909 to the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, on behalf of the Sligo, Leitrim, and Northern Counties Railway Company, and having regard to the fact that this railway is not managed in accordance with public opinion in the counties through which it runs, inquiries will be made regarding the same before sanctioning this grant.

MR. HOBHOUSE : The grant in question was simply the formal remission of arrears of interest due on a loan in accordance with an arrangement made in 1896, when the affairs of the company were settled under a reconstruction scheme. The remission was confirmed by the Public Works Loans Act of this session, and the transaction is thereby closed. In these circumstances the course suggested by the hon. Member is impracticable.

Killea Post Office.

MR. C. MACVEIGH (Donegal, E.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to the proposed removal of the Post Office from Killea, East Donegal, into the County Derry, to the inconvenience of the people now served by it ; whether he is aware that the proposed change would only benefit a few at the cost of the bulk of the people having to walk long distances to post and obtain their letters ; and whether he will take immediate steps to keep the office in the hands of the same family and in the same place, where it has given general satisfaction for years, and prevent an injustice being done to Donegal in order to serve Derry.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The necessary inquiries regarding the candidates for the vacant sub-office at Killea have not yet been completed. In selecting a new sub-postmaster, due regard will be given to the position of the premises offered. In the circumstances I can hold out no hope that a member of the family of the late sub-postmistress will be appointed.

Portumna Postal Service.

MR. JOHN ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the town of Portumna, County Galway, is at present without a mid-day mail, while small towns in its vicinity of not more than one-fourth its population have the advantage of one; whether it takes four days to convey newspapers per parcel post from Ennis to Portumna; has he received resolutions from public bodies calling his attention to this matter; and what steps he proposes to take,

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: An application on this subject has been received and is now under inquiry.

Queen Anne's Bounty Board.

SIR G. KEKEWICH (Exeter): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, seeing that a Select Committee reported in 1901 that the Queen Anne's Bounty Board and the Ecclesiastical Commission might advantageously be united so as to effect a saving of money estimated by the then Archbishop of Canterbury at £20,000 to £30,000 per annum, he will consider the desirability of taking steps, at the first convenient opportunity, to carry out the recommendation of the Committee.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): I am aware that the Select Committee of 1901 reported generally in favour of the amalgamation of the Queen Anne's Bounty Board and the Ecclesiastical Commission, and that a Bill to carry this into effect was introduced in 1902, but subsequently dropped. The question is, no doubt, one deserving serious attention, but in view of more pressing matters which will have to be dealt with I can give no undertaking that the Government will introduce a measure on the subject.

The Peers and Government Bills.

MR. HENRY (Shropshire, Wellington): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if, after recent and previous experiences, in order that the time and energy of Members of this House may not be devoted to consideration of Bills after the Second Reading before it is ascertained whether the House of Lords accept the principles of the provisions of Bills introduced in this House, he will consider the desirability of endeavouring to make necessary arrangements that the Committee and subsequent stages of Bills that have received a Second Reading in this House be deferred until such measures have received a Second Reading in the House of Lords.

MR. ASQUITH: My hon. friend has made a very novel proposal, to which, as at present advised, I should hesitate to assent.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Could not the Government easily find out what the action of the House of Lords would be by asking the Leader of the Opposition?

[No Answer was returned.]

The Lado Enclave.

MR. FELL: I beg to ask the Prime Minister if, having regard to the position that has arisen in the Lado enclave, and to the mischief that has followed on the withdrawal of troops of the Congo Free State, he will consider the advisability of transferring the management of the enclave, subject to the lease to the King of the Belgians, to the Colonial Office, so that it may be administered with the East African Protectorate and Uganda.

MR. ASQUITH: The Agreement of 9th May, 1906, between Great Britain and the Independent State of the Congo provides that on the termination of occupation of the Lado enclave by His Majesty King Leopold II., the territory shall be handed over within six months to the Soudanese Government. His Majesty's Government do not propose to alter that arrangement.

MR. FELL: Have not the Colonial Office the better machinery for administering such territory?

MR. ASQUITH: The territory will be handed over as soon as circumstances permit.

Trawling Prevention Bill.

MR. SUTHERLAND (Elgin Burghs): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the near approach of the end of the session, he will state when the Second Reading and subsequent stages of the Trawling in Prohibited Areas Prevention Bill will be taken.

MR. CATHCART WASON: At the same time may I ask the Prime Minister if he can now state if the Prevention of Trawling in Prohibited Areas Bill will be pressed this year, or if it will be deferred till next session; and, in view of its importance not only to Scottish interests but to the credit of the country, if it will receive a prominent place in His Gracious Majesty's speech.

MR. ASQUITH: I am afraid that I cannot add anything to the statement that I made on this matter on the 19th, but I may add that I hope to be able to make a statement as to the future course of public business some time next week.

The Education Bill.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) asked the Prime Minister whether further negotiations were proceeding between him and the Archbishop of Canterbury in relation to the Education Bill, and if so whether the House would be informed of the result.

MR. ASQUITH: The only correspondence that has taken place has already appeared in the public Press.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London): May I ask the Prime Minister whether it would be convenient to him, either to-day or later, to make a general statement as to the Business of the House. The right hon. Gentleman postponed last week a general statement until he knew the decision of the House of Lords in regard to the Licensing Bill. I imagine that the decision of the House of Lords is now generally known; and that being so, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman may now be prepared to make the general statement which he promised.

MR. ASQUITH: That element of uncertainty has been removed; but I should prefer to defer my statement a little time.

LORDS AND COMMONS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to give notice that on an early day I shall move the following Resolution, "That having regard to the fact that serious questions affecting the working of the Parliamentary system have arisen from the differences between the two Houses, the time has now come for dealing with the position and composition of the House of Lords; either by the initiation of legislation for the purpose, or by the exercise of the Royal prerogative to withhold the issue of writs of summons to Peers of the realm to attend Parliament, on the advice of Ministers responsible to the House of Commons and through the House of Commons to the people, or by both methods, so as to secure that the accident of birth shall no longer afford rights of controlling the legislation of a free and self-governing people."

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (ENGLAND AND WALES) (No. 2) BILL.

*MR. SPEAKER said the instructions to the Committee, appearing on the Paper in the names of the hon. Members for the Walton division of Liverpool and North-West Manchester, were out of order.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[MR. EMMOTT (Oldham) in the Chair.]

Clause 1:

*THE CHAIRMAN said the first Amendment on the Paper, in the name of the hon. Member for East Mayo, should come in after the word "authority" in line 6 instead of at the beginning of the clause.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said that unless the words he proposed were inserted at the beginning of the clause, it would probably be impossible to raise the question as between contracting-out and coming into the national system for the Catholic schools. If the Amendment was put down to come in after the word "authority," it could not be discussed, as the Amendments preceding that word were so important that they would fully occupy the time at the disposal of the Committee. He would respectfully urge that, unless the Chairman's sense was very strong that the words were out of order at the beginning of the clause, he should not deprive him of the opportunity to move them now; otherwise they would be prevented from raising what to them was the supreme issue of the Bill.

*THE CHAIRMAN said the Committee was acting under an order made by the House, and he had no responsibility for that order, except to see that it was carried out. The reason why the Amendment could not be allowed at the beginning of the clause was that it was a rule of Committee debates that an Amendment could not be proposed to insert words at the commencement of a clause with a view to proposing an alternative scheme to that in the clause. It was obvious that if that were allowed, they might never get to the clause at all.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford) said the Amendment his hon. friend did not propose an alternative scheme; it only proposed an exception to the general scheme contained in the clause.

*THE CHAIRMAN said there was no question but that it was a separate scheme from the point of view of a Committee debate.

MR. HUNT (Shropshire, Ludlow), in moving the omission of subsection (1), said the reason he had put down the Amendment was that he could not see why what were called the provided schools should not have just as much right to have money from the rates as any other schools. Indeed, he thought they had a little more right because those who provided the schools had saved the State a lot of money by building the schools and finding the money to carry them on. Therefore, if any schools ought to have rate aid, surely those were the schools. Under this clause they were penalising the very people who had helped the State and who had done for education what the State never did in the old days, and he could not help thinking that instead of disallowing their payment from the rates they should have a fair system, and that, at all events, those denominations who had already helped education ought certainly to have their fair share of the rates. Until they got a fair settlement of this question on those lines, this education difficulty would never be settled.

"In page 1, line 5, to leave out subsection (1)."—(Mr. Hunt.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'an elementary school' stand part of the clause."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury) said the hon. Member must be quite well aware that the Government could not accept the Amendment. If it were carried it would leave the denominational schools on the rates now exactly as they were at present. Any arrangement entered into was subject to the condition that the denominational schools should not be rate-aided, and he doubted whether the object of the hon. Gentleman would be carried out even if his Amendment were agreed to. The corollary of rate-aid was obviously local public control, and he did not think the hon. Gentleman wished that to be applied to the schools with which he was more immediately associated. The Amendment raised the whole question that had been debated in times past, and was indeed the basis of the compromise. He could not, therefore, see his way to accept the Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said the right hon. Gentleman had not surprised any of them in not accepting the Amendment. He quite agreed that he could not accept it. It raised the general question of the whole Bill, and it gave an occasion, of which he thought the Committee should take advantage, of really arriving at some clear idea of the present condition of affairs. The right hon. Gentleman talked of the compromise which had been arrived at, and the Prime Minister on a previous day said the Bill could only pass as an agreed Bill. It was because the House had been led to think by the Government and by other speakers that this was an agreed Bill, in the words of the Prime Minister, and an agreed compromise, in the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Education, that it received the degree of favour which it did receive in the Second Reading debate and that the benches he was now addressing were relatively so thinly occupied. The Members of that House undoubtedly had got the impression, rightly or wrongly that they were discussing a measure upon which very eminent ecclesiastical dignitaries of the Church of England, of the Church of Rome, and of the Nonconformist bodies had been consulted. That was the impression under which the House had consented in the first place to pass the Second Reading and, in the second place, to submit to closure by compartments. That was the view. Was it the correct view? He thought they were really bound a little to press the Government upon this point. The Prime Minister, in answer to a question that afternoon, had said that there was no more correspondence than that which had appeared in the Press between the Archbishop and the Government. He wished distinctly to understand how the matter stood between the Government and the Archbishop of Canterbury, and between the Government and those with whom they had been in communication, and who represented the Roman Catholic Church. When the Prime Minister said there was no further correspondence since last Thursday, was it to be understood that since then the Archbishop of Canterbury had made no representation to the Government on the subject of this Bill? If the Archbishop had not—he wished specifically to put this question—did the right hon. Gentleman interpret his silence as meaning that he was content with the financial proposal for schools and the arrangements for transfer and maintenance? As the hon. Member for Mayo had said, when Clause 1 was passed the Committee would be committed absolutely to the destruction of voluntary schools; they would go beyond recall so far as the Committee was concerned when subsection (1) of Clause 1 was passed. Surely, then, the Committee ought to know if the parties to the compromise or arrangement were content with the terms upon which the schools were to go. It must be clear to every member of the Committee that the Government had no right to consider the Bill as an agreed Bill unless the compromise covered all the questions lying behind the clause. What would be their position if they found during the next three days, in the course of the operation of the closure, that upon the points upon which the compromise was supposed to be arranged the arrangements were unsatisfactory? It was not an unreasonable question to ask the right hon. Gentleman to tell the Committee in explicit categorical terms how the incomplete correspondence with the Archbishop had terminated; whether the agreement which had not been arrived at when the correspondence came to a conclusion had been now arrived at; if not, what was the nature of the hitch, and whether it was a difficulty which should induce the Committee to hesitate to pass sub-clause (1) as part of an agreed Bill. Also, he asked if the Roman Catholic Church was contented with the arrangement that had been come to with regard to contracting-out schools. These were reasonable questions to ask and answer there and then, and unless there was a clear and explicit statement it was not legitimate for the right hon. Gentleman to talk of an accepted compromise, and for the Prime Minister to speak of this as an agreed Bill. He pressed the matter no further at the moment, but awaited with anxiety what the right hon. Gentleman had to say.

LORD EDMUND TALBOT (Sussex, Chichester) thought the right hon. Gentleman would have replied at once to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition, but as he was going to defer his answer he would like to ask him to develop, if he could, what fell from the Prime Minister on Friday last in reference to the position of the Catholic contracted-out schools under the Bill. It was quite clear, as had been pointed out, that owing to the Chairman's ruling on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Mayo, when the Committee passed Clause 1 under the closure at half-past ten o'clock, then, so far as contracting-out schools were concerned, the question would be settled. The Prime Minister intimated on Friday that the question of grants to contracting-out schools was still an open question, and by so saying, as he understood Parliamentary phraseology, the Prime Minister intimated that the scheduled grants as they now stood in the Bill would be raised. Before the Committee came to a decision upon this part of Clause 1 it was only fair they should be told what was to be the amount to be given to the contracting-out schools. If they were not given that information then it would seem the Government were following the same course they had pursued with the Archbishop of Canterbury and which had led to the difficulty in which the Prime Minister now found himself. For reasons best known to himself the right hon. Gentleman avoided in his correspondence and conversation with the Archbishop letting the latter know what the grants were going to be. Even when the Archbishop was sent a draft of the Bill the amount was left blank in the Bill. Were they now going to be treated in the same way? If so, it was not courteous; it was not fair to the House; and, on behalf of his co-religionists, he asked to be informed before proceeding further what grants were to be proposed for the contracted-out schools.

MR. LYTTTELTON (St. George's, Hanover Square), as one who had voted for the Second Reading of the Bill, earnestly asked for an answer to the question. He had not the opportunity in a few moments on the Second Reading to give his reason why he was disinclined to stand in the way of a settlement; but as he had said publicly since, his vote was given subject to the reservation that the right of entry should be further safeguarded, and that Amendments to the contracting-out and transfer clauses should be of a very substantial character. He further had said, and he repeated, that he would not give up the position he had taken in voting for the Second Reading, unless satisfied that the rights of Roman Catholics were safeguarded; that was a question of honour and equity. It was a matter of the gravest importance, before deciding on this clause, to know exactly what the position was, whether an agreement had been arrived at with the Church of England, Nonconformists, and Roman Catholics. He most earnestly trusted that some further light would be thrown upon this matter.

MR. RUNCIMAN said he was sure there would be no desire that he should make a Second Reading speech on every Amendment, but he would be glad to give such information as was asked for. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition seemed to be under some misapprehension. When he last spoke the Prime Minister said this was not to be treated as a treaty between high contracting parties, and the Government had not diverged from their position; they thought they had arrived at common ground upon which they could proceed, and that common ground was that there should be no rate aid to any school not under public control and management. That principle was clear from the outset, it was in the letter from the Prime Minister to the Primate, it was made the first condition and not objected to, and was part of the agreement. The right hon. Gentleman asked if there was any further correspondence since the letter between the Government and the Archbishop of Canterbury. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman had seen the letters between the Archbishop and the Prime Minister published on Saturday. Perhaps he had better read a passage from the Prime Minister's letter—

"We are not only willing but anxious to hear and consider any criticisms you may have to offer on the schedules as they at present stand. Mr. Runciman will very gladly accept your offer of a conference with expert assistance. It would, however, facilitate matters if in advance you would kindly have sent to him a statement in outline (not, of course, in detail) of any specific objections to the proposed scale and of any counter-proposal which you may wish to formulate."

When they came to these subjects they would be treated with every consideration, and the Government would do what they could to show that their proposals were perfectly reasonable, absolutely fulfilling the undertaking of the Prime Minister that the contracted-out schools should have a reasonable chance of existence. They would be able to show when they came to that stage that they had made full and ample provision for contracted-out schools. The transfer of schools they would treat in exactly the same way, and he would be able to give good grounds, not only in theory, but in practice, for the belief that their terms were fair and just. He altogether deprecated discussions of either of the Schedules on the first subsection. They would have full time for discussing them. On Wednesday they had put down the Report stage of the Financial Resolution, when he hoped to make a fuller statement on the finances of the Bill. They had increased the number of days for the Committee stage so that both Schedules might come under full discussion, and there was no reason to believe that out of that discussion they would not come fully justified.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) wished to say with very great respect, for they all knew the great courtesy with which the President of the Board of Education had handled this difficult matter, that the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the question of the Leader of the Opposition. He had referred to the Schedules and to Clause 2, and had said that he hoped and believed that the financial terms of the Schedule providing sums for the contracted-out schools and the administrative terms of the clause would, when reached, be considered satisfactory by the Committee. That was not an answer to the question whether the Government had arrived at a complete understanding with the Archbishop of Canterbury and those who spoke for the Roman Catholics upon whether the terms would be considered by them as adequate, effective, and full.

They could not pass subsection (1) of Clause 1 until they had an answer to that question. The point was not whether the Government thought their terms adequate, but whether they could say that those who spoke for the Church of England and the Roman Catholics thought them adequate. Otherwise it would not be an agreed Bill and they must look at this subsection as if it was the beginning of a Bill introduced under ordinary circumstances. In view of the silence with which the right hon. Gentleman had met his right hon. friend's question, they saw at once that the subsection was the foundation of the whole Bill. The President of the Board of Education said that it was one of the items on which an agreement had been arrived at, but it was not an item at all, but the foundation of the whole scheme. It was only an item if agreement had been reached on all the other items—the terms for contracted-out schools, the transfer of Church schools in single-school areas, and the right of entry in county council schools. Being a foundation, it was obvious that it would determine both the shape and stability of everything super-imposed upon it. When they voted at half-past ten that night for the clause they would definitely give up one system of national education for another.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: So far as the Committee is concerned.

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, so far as this House was concerned. Unless on the Report stage they diametrically reversed the view they took in Committee, so far as this House was concerned, they would substitute for the existing system a system which educational experts told them would be less efficient and which financial experts told them would be more expensive. Under ordinary circumstances everybody would agree that the House of Commons would feel it its duty to examine such provisions with minute care and somewhat prolonged deliberation; but none of them would pretend that they were discussing the question under ordinary circumstances. They were discussing it under somewhat extraordinary and, he thought, extra-constitutional conditions. They had been told by the newspapers that this item embodied the upshot of the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the Primate of the Established Church. Did it embody that? Had they reached a conclusion? Until they knew that, what was the use of referring them to the newspapers of the country? It might be that thanks to the good offices of the Prime Minister and the Primate they were relieved of their functions and had no duty to perform. That seemed to be the view of the Government, because, as they had had no opportunity of collecting the opinion of their constituents, it was evident that they were not in a position to perform the duties that generally devolved upon them. They were invited by the Minister for Education—he would not say commanded, as he did not wish to import heat into the debate—simply to signify their assent to an agreement which the official heads of the political and ecclesiastical institutions of the country had almost, if they had not quite, arrived at. In response to that invitation they were entitled to ask whether they had arrived, or had almost arrived, and, certainly, whether they were sure to arrive, at an agreement. If there was any doubt about that, the whole case for passing Clause 1 as an item of compromise fell to the ground. It was suggested that if the Prime Minister and the Primate did not quite understand each other then all misunderstandings would be cleared up in another place. Was he to understand that they were to march into the lobby when the guillotine fell and that all outstanding differences of the most fundamental character were to be adjusted by the Lords spiritual and temporal? Was that the view of the supporters of the Government? Since that was the very minor role allocated to the House of Commons he thought that they ought to be very grateful to the Prime Minister for having allowed them a whole day in which to signify their formal assent and to put their mark on an instrument of policy on which the Prime Minister and the Primate might possibly agree. The first Minister of the Crown and the Archbishop of Canterbury had done their work for them. It was quite like the old times. They were back in the Middle Ages. But even then the rude representatives of the people were permitted to take the liberty of asking a few questions, and he would ask the Minister for Education three questions [Cries of "Oh."] Was that too much? Their right to debate ended at half-past ten; was it too much to ask three questions on a Bill of this magnitude? His first was whether it was a fact that, if they passed this subsection now, contracted-out schools were a necessary consequence. Was it a fact that they would adopt contracting-out into the national educational system? They knew what the result of the division would be. The battalion opposite was very well drilled and observed silence in the ranks. Very few would speak; fewer would listen; and all would march into the "Aye" lobby. So it was not hypothetical, but if they passed the subsection they would have adopted, after one day's debate, contracting-out as part of the national system. If that was so, they knew where they were. Then he asked his second question. Would not that impose a very considerable burden upon the taxpayers, who would have to provide the Parliamentary grant to support these contracted-out schools; and would it not, under subsection (3) of the clause, impose a very large burden on the ratepayers who were invited to run rate-aided schools in competition against the taxpayers' schools? Was it not clear that if they passed the subsection they were going to embarrass the financial position of the country? His third question was whether the Minister for Education had made any attempt to estimate the cost put on the taxpayers and ratepayers if they passed the subsection with all the consequences it entailed. If the subsection was passed, it was perfectly clear that they would be committed to contracting-out on a large scale and to a large increase of the education grant, along with, in all probability, equivalent grants for that purpose, or another purpose, in Scotland and Ireland. That was clear, but what was not clear was why it should be done. It would have been quite clear if the Minister of Education had been able and willing to answer his right hon. friend. If the right hon. Gentleman had been able, he was quite sure that he would have been willing to answer his right hon. friend. If this was an agreed Bill, an accepted compromise, then the answer would be that they asked the House to pass subsection (1) Clause 1 in the hope of peace. But if the right hon. Gentleman was not able to give that assurance what possible reason could there be to ask the House to divide the national system of education into two conflicting parts, and to place great burdens on the taxpayers and on the ratepayers in order to introduce separate kinds of schools running in competition with each other? Perhaps by so doing the Government would discover another method of relieving unemployment. There was little hope for peace unless the Minister for Education could reply satisfactorily to his right hon. friend. He himself was sorry for it. When the State announced that in future it would stamp its approval on only one form of religious instruction in a country which had hitherto been famous for the vigour and variety of its religious convictions, what great hope was there of peace? Unless the Minister for Education could say that this was an agreed Bill, an accepted compromise, the hope of peace became less and less; and it had been extinguished by the conditions under which they were asked to welcome this measure, because they were asked by the closure Resolution really to abandon their position under the Constitution and to accept an approximate agreement between the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Prime Minister to be reviewed or ratified, if reviewed or ratified at all, not there but in the House of Lords.

*MR. HAROLD COX (Preston) said that the obvious meaning of this clause was that no rate aid of any kind was to be given to any schools except those of a certain character. It was notorious that all the Roman Catholic schools in the country declined to take to themselves that character, and therefore the House was proposing that no rate aid should be given to any Roman Catholic schools. That was, he maintained, an essentially unjust proposition, however many archbishops or bishops had agreed to it. He did not think that anyone on that side of the House denied that the Roman Catholics paid rates for the support of schools to which it was admitted that they could not send their children, and therefore they had an absolute claim in equity to a refund of a proportionate share of the rates for the support of schools to which they could send their children. There never had been an attempt to answer that argument. The plausible excuse had occasionally been given that if this argument were applied to education they might apply it to battleships and free libraries. But surely the distinction was very great. They built battleships for common national purposes, but they had not yet come to the point of deciding that there was one common national religion to which every citizen in this country was bound to conform. At any rate, he hoped not. But if there was not a common national religion to which they were all bound to conform, he had a right to say to one section of the community: "If you take my money for your schools, I have a right to ask for a share of your money for my schools." He held this proposition, apart from the question of putting the schools in an efficient condition. He held it on the ground of financial honesty. That being so, if the Government proceeded on the principle of refusing rate aid to voluntary schools, they were bound to make that loss good out of State aid. Personally he had never been able to appreciate this great mystery of the distinction between rate aid and State aid. In various parts of the world there were various strange creeds supported by the State, but never before had people been found willing to maintain as an article of faith, for which they would fight to their last gasp, that there was an eternally sacred distinction between rates and taxes. Yet that was the proposition which seemed to be put forward now. He hoped that hon. Members opposite would not fall into the same folly and insist on having actual rate aid for their schools when they could get a proportional contribution from the Imperial Exchequer. He readily admitted that they were right in objecting to a fixed Exchequer grant, for the fixed Exchequer grant took no account whatever of the variable cost of education in different places, or of its tendency to increase.

*THE CHAIRMAN said he thought that the hon. Gentleman was not in order to go into these details at the present stage, although he might refer generally to the financial effect of contracting-out.

*MR. HAROLD COX said that he did not object to contracting-out. He was one of the few Members of the House who actually believed in contracting-out. Two years ago he proposed an Amendment in favour of it and hon. Gentleman opposite, both above and below the gangway, voted for it although they now explained that they did so not believing in it. On that occasion the Government voted against his Amendment, yet now they had embodied it in their Bill. Whether they believed in it or not he should not care to guess. Personally he believed that contracting-out was the only possible solution of this difficulty, and that they would never get real liberty for the schools of the country except by freeing them from local control. His hon. friends opposite said that they objected to contracting-out because it would put the Catholic schools outside the national system of education. That was a very attractive phrase, but did it really mean anything? Were not Eton and Harrow as much part of our national system of education as the schools maintained by the Borough Council of West Ham? Before the Committee adopted this clause it ought to be made perfectly clear that the Government did propose to take account of the difference in the cost of schools in different areas, and to provide for the progressive increase of the cost of elementary education in the council schools.

MR. BELLOC (Salford, S.) thought it would be necessary for every Roman Catholic to support the Amendment. They regretted this, because there were many of them, certainly all of them who took any interest and part in the public life of the country, who recognised clearly that the attempt which was being made to make a settlement of this vexed education question was a genuine one and was the outcome of a great deal of energy on the part of the Minister for Education. He acknowledged that in framing this subsection of the Bill, the Board of Education believed that they must accept the only alternative offered to the Catholics. But he respectfully submitted that they had not taken sufficient steps to find out whether the Catholics could accept it or another. The Catholics, as the House knew, numbered from five to seven per cent. of the population of the country. They were so concentrated in numbers that their particular position in the community did not make them indeed the dominant party, but their vote very largely influenced elections in such districts as his own constituency of Salford and in Manchester, Bradford, Liverpool, and some districts of London. He submitted that that point of view was not sufficiently studied in the hurried communications which had taken place with the heads of the Catholic party at the last moment.

MR. RUNCIMAN said that his hon. friend was under a complete misapprehension. Both his predecessors were in full communication and touch with the highest dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church in this country, both in the summer and in the autumn.

MR. BELLOC said he knew as a fact that the predecessor of the right hon. Gentleman and, even more, the predecessor of his predecessor were in touch with them, but if the Minister for Education was under the impression that he had arrived at some sort of final solution with the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church, then he said that personally, and other members of that Church and the whole hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church, disagreed with him. The unanimity on this matter was very different from the diverse feelings which existed when the Bill of the present Chief Secretary for Ireland was under discussion; and that unanimity, if it existed, made it dangerous for the future progress of this Bill. He wanted to explain why the feeling that this clause was unreasonable existed amongst many of the members of other religious communities than the Catholic or the Anglican. His hon. friend the Member for Preston said that when contracting-out was proposed two years ago the Irish Party, or at any rate the Catholic

Members of that Party, voted for it. They voted for it as the lesser of two evils in a Bill of the most drastic kind, proposed if he might say so, as a weapon of offence. This Bill was not of that character. This Bill had the character of a final compromise and was put forward indeed, almost as non-contentious. The other was described, in a military metaphor as a sword. What was more, they opposed contracting-out because there was very considerable danger—he used the word danger advisedly—of this compromise becoming law. They all saw the conversation which took place on the front Opposition bench when another place was alluded to, but he did not think that that other place, which was already waking up to the mistake it had made in the last few days, was going to make another mistake, and he was not aware that Lord Rothschild possessed any debentures or monetary interest, and, therefore, he did not think he would enter into this matter. He did not think it would concern those things the noble Lord thought most important, and it was on that account and because some of the Anglican episcopacy and many men of various parties in this House were agreed upon this compromise—it was because it was the more likely to become law that the more strenuously should they oppose the propositions which it contained. They could not accept the position of inferiors receiving a smaller amount than their fellow citizens, while they paid the same taxes, and if schools were to be established in this country under what he believed was its national religion—[Cries of “What is it?”]—Cowper-Templeism—and if Catholics were to be treated as exceptional people who must be fined for holding a religion of somewhat greater antiquity and with somewhat sharper definitions, they would resist it in this House, they would resist it when or if the Bill became law, and—he knew the gravity of saying this, but he might say it with perfect justice—he believed that in making such a proposition the Government would create a position not only untenable in logic, but unworkable in practice.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) said the only comment he would make upon the speech of the hon. Member for South Salford was to protest that Cowper-Templeism, whatever that might mean, was not the national religion, unless it was true, as he believed an interesting writer had said, that religion was dead in this country. As to the Amendment, the right hon. Gentleman in his answer said that the Bill was not an agreement and repeated what had been said before by speakers on the Treasury bench, but he did not think he meant himself to be taken quite seriously. Nobody in the Committee supposed that the Bill would ever have been introduced unless the Government had been able to flourish before the House something in the nature of an agreement which they had arrived at with the Archbishop of Canterbury. Everybody knew that that was the foundation on which the Bill rested, and he thought that was clear from the right hon. Gentleman's own speech, because he went on to say that the Archbishop never objected to this subsection, which was an essential part of their scheme. He had done his best to read the voluminous correspondence between the Government and the Archbishop which had been published, and he should say that the Archbishop objected in almost every line to this subsection. He said it was a most tremendous sacrifice and was a thing to which he could scarcely ask his fellow-Churchmen to agree. Every argument of the Archbishop was a complete objection to this subsection. The most reverend Prelate said—he did not agree with him—that the other advantages of the Bill were such as to enable him to agree to that subsection. [MINISTERIAL cheers]. Yes, but what were those advantages? One of the chief, which the Archbishop had said was absolutely essential, was still a matter of negotiation. That was why the right hon. Gentleman not only in form but in substance had not answered in any degree the question put to him. The point was quite simple. This had been represented by the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman himself as in the nature of a treaty—[Cries of “No”]—well, as a compromise or a balanced settlement. He did not care about phrases, he was dealing with facts. They were given a balance-sheet by both of the Ministers, and foremost amongst those things which the Church gave up were the matters contained in this subsection. What they wanted to know was what was to be put on the other side of the balance-sheet. The right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to assure the House that these items of the balance-sheet had been agreed upon, but it was quite immaterial whether they put anything on the other side. It was like the right hon. Gentleman saying he had agreed to sell a horse and the price did not matter. ["No."] That was precisely the same thing. It was all very well for members of the Nonconformist party to protest against that, but they would find if they examined it that the parallel was an absolutely true one. He had not overlooked the correspondence which was published in Saturday's Papers. Nothing could be more clear than what the Archbishop said. He said that the question of the Schedule was absolutely an essential question. In so many words he said it was essential to the agreement and essential to the settlement they had come to. Therefore it was absolutely absurd to say that when he agreed to this subsection he agreed to it without reference to the terms which the Schedule was to contain. There was one passage in the letters published on Saturday to which he desired to draw the attention of the Committee because it might be the explanation. The Prime Minister said he had purposely put off the Schedule till Tuesday in order to give time for negotiations and discussion. Did that mean that if the negotiations did not result in an agreement the Government would withdraw the Bill? There was no answer at present, but he thought the Committee would be very glad to know that. It was not for him to criticise hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite; it might well be thought it was consistent with the views of a party which was always denouncing sacerdotalism to try and settle the education question by an agreement with the Archbishop. He did not know how that might be, but they ought to know whether, if an agreement was not arrived at on Tuesday next, the Bill would be withdrawn. He was obliged to ask that question.

*THE CHAIRMAN said he really must call the hon. Member to order. He had given him very large latitude, but clearly there must be a limit to the questions asked, and he did not think that which the noble Lord asked came within the scope of the subsection.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR on the point of order said he wished to ask a question. He believed he was right in saying that this Bill was presented as an arrangement in which two sides both gave up something. Something which was given up was represented by the subsection, and what they were anxious to know was whether an arrangement had been come to as to what was to be given up on the other side. He would ask as a point of order whether it was not absolutely necessary before they allowed subsection (1) to pass into the Bill they should know what was the corresponding arrangement on the other side, and could that be excluded from their discussion. It was a very exceptional position of affairs, which justified him in putting a point of order in that particular form.

*THE CHAIRMAN said he thought the right hon. Gentleman if he had been in the House would have noticed that he had not pulled up anybody for putting a question of that kind, but now the noble Lord wished to know if the Bill was going to be withdrawn under certain conditions, and he thought that was not allowable.

LORD R. CECIL said he would not repeat what he had said; he was only going to make this one other observation, which he thought the Chairman would allow, that the question of whether an agreement or not was arrived at was really a matter of vital importance to the House in considering whether they would assent to this subsection, and they had to consider, in assuming the probability of such an agreement, this further fact—that they had a statement by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Archbishop of Westminster that the terms offered were grossly insufficient. They had the converse statement repeated with great energy by several eminent Nonconformists, that no concession of any further kind would be made to the denominations in question. It would, therefore, seem impossible for the Government to give way or make any further advances in connection with the schedule, and, therefore, they had to take it for the purposes of this discussion that on the terms as they stood the only authority which gave the Government the least right to say that this was a balanced settlement or an agreed Bill had absolutely repudiated the measure as it stood at present, and on that ground, without going into the tremendous sacrifices which this subsection imposed upon the Church, without repeating what he said on the Second Reading as to the total inadequacy of the Bill—on that ground if all the other grounds were swept away, he should feel himself compelled to vote for the Amendment of his hon. friend.

MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walton) said that in the few observations he had to make, he would not say anything which would make any concession difficult of attainment, and he should not have made any observations at all on the subject before the Committee, if he had not wished to give utterance in the House to the objection which was so very strongly felt, as he believed, with increasing force in Lancashire, a county in which he represented a constituency. He would ask the Committee most earnestly to consider for a moment the wholly exceptional position of Lancashire as far as these proposals were concerned. He did not wish to elaborate or to repeat the points which had already been frequently made in the course of these debates, but the Committee was probably aware that the majority of the children in Lancashire at the present time were being educated in voluntary schools, and taking the population as a whole by any test of homogeneity that could be applied, the denominational system was one which was suited to and warmly appreciated by the great mass of the population throughout this county. That was true of Lancashire, and he wished to draw an analogy for a moment between the state of affairs in Lancashire and the state of affairs throughout the country as far as the Roman Catholics were concerned. Many of his own constituents were Roman Catholics, and held views on this subject which were certainly quite as strong and unimpeachable as those held by Anglicans. This Bill was put forward as an agreed settlement, and as a compromise which it was presumed gave to the Church and the Roman Catholics something more than they would have been able to obtain under previous Bills which they had successfully resisted. If that were not the case put forward it was clear that there would not be any great inducement for this change, which they were resisting by every means in their power, because they believed that if they were to waive their objections and support the present proposal the paradoxical consequence would occur that Lancashire and the Roman Catholic schools would be actually in a worse position under Clause 1 of the present Bill than they were under the Bill of the last Education Minister but one, the Chief Secretary for Ireland. There was in his Bill the safeguard that under certain conditions the rates would be still available for denominational schools, and they were not cut adrift from the national system. Now, they had a much worse Bill, which was put forward as an improvement. So far as Lancashire was concerned, it would not be disputed by any Lancashire Member that the majority of the people there continued to desire that denominational instruction should have recourse to the rates. The Bill, however, said that if they retained that teaching they must be cut adrift from the rates and make heavy sacrifices. In Blackburn they had a denominational school which would cost them £6,000 a year under that Bill.

MR. RUNCIMAN: Has the hon. Member taken into consideration the question of pooling?

MR. F. E. SMITH said he had not taken that into account in this case, but he was informed, on behalf both of Roman Catholics and of Anglicans, that taking the country as a whole pooling would not introduce any very material qualification of the figures. But even if some reduction were made, the position in Blackburn would be that the people would still have to pay rates in support of teaching of which they disapproved, and to contribute a very large sum in order to retain the privilege of carrying on their own schools. This was the very negation of equality as between the different sects, and he formally gave notice that if the Bill passed there would not be an election in Lancashire at which candidates on both sides would not be asked: "Are you prepared to increase the grant until it coincides with the full total cost of secular education?"

*THE CHAIRMAN said the question of the adequacy of the grant to contracting-out schools did not arise now.

MR. F. E. SMITH said that in his judgment there never would be a settlement upon the terms laid down in the Bill. But if the Government would deal with voluntary schools upon a basis of exact equality, then there would be a permanent settlement. Exact equality meant that there should be a right of entry, and that denominationalists should be treated in precisely the same way as those devoted to Cowper-Temple teaching were treated in the council schools, without any of these almost insulting distinctions.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is making a Second Reading speech. Cowper-Templeism does not arise on this Amendment.

MR. F. E. SMITH submitted that it was impossible to discuss the Amendment unless they considered the terms to be granted to contracting-out schools. As one who had never pretended to be a strong denominationalist, but who had always lived among a community of very strong denominationalists, he predicted that unless the Government recognised that there must be equality of treatment there would be no compromise.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) said that all his constituents felt deeply about this Bill. They had not been consulted on the compromise. If they had been they would not have agreed to it in any way. Under it the voluntary schools, Anglican and Catholic, were to be handed over to the local education authorities, and when they remembered that 700,000 children were being educated in the voluntary schools they would agree that the subsection might have a very important and far-reaching effect. By the subsection the managers and trustees of the voluntary schools would be compelled to hand over schools held under charitable trusts which specially laid down that the teaching of the Church of England and no other was to be given in them. Cowper-Temple teaching would be given in them everyday by the local education authority, and it would be small comfort to know that denominational religion might be allowed an entry on two days a week. It was a strong order to ask denominational school managers to hand over their schools on such terms. Thousands of the working men of Lancashire had built these schools in order to educate their children in the faith of their parents. Let the Committee consider what their feelings would be. Was there any justice in the proposition that these schools should be handed over and that on two days a week denominational teaching should be given, but on the other five days Cowper-Temple teaching should be given?

*THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that that question did not arise on the subsection.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) said he was aware of the multifarious duties of the Prime Minister, but he felt obliged to say that he bitterly regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not found it possible to be present during this discussion. The Bill was of such supreme importance, and so difficult was the task before them, that the Committee really needed the guidance of the right hon. Gentleman during the discussion. He could not help thinking that had the Prime Minister been present, he would have begun to regret that he had insisted upon their proceeding with the Bill with so much rapidity and so little time to consider it. After all, this measure was presented as being the outcome of an understanding between Nonconformist opinion on the one side and Anglican opinion on the other, and that the differences between the parties had been almost bridged. The Prime Minister had stated that the two bodies had come so closely together and the gap between them was so small that it was the duty of the Government itself to step in and bridge it over. What they wanted to know was whether the Prime Minister or the Minister for Education was in a position to say that that statement correctly described the position to-day. He thought that the Prime Minister's statement left out of account the position of the Roman Catholics. At any rate, the passage of the right hon. Gentleman's speech to which he referred did not allude to them. It was confined to the Nonconformists and to the members of the Church of England. But the question with which the debate started and which still remained unanswered, though put by his right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition, was whether the statement of the Prime Minister correctly represented the position. It might be that he thought it represented the position, but when he used those words the other day, did they correctly represent the position? That the right hon. Gentleman thought they did, they one and all recognised to the full. But they had seen the correspondence which appeared on Saturday in the newspapers, and there was grave reason to doubt that the Government had really brought the two parties so closely together as they thought. Throughout the debate they had seen that those who were accustomed to act together in the closest harmony in that House had found themselves taking different views of this solution, and they all of them had to do the best they could under very difficult circumstances. But surely it was material for them to know whether what was within this Bill offered the means of enduring peace, and also what was the present position of the negotiations. As his noble friend the Member for Marylebone had pointed out, this Bill was not merely as a whole a balanced settlement, but clause was balanced against clause, and, as the Prime Minister himself had pointed out, Clause 1 was the great concession to Nonconformist opinion. It was, therefore, very material to know what was expected to be received in return for what they gave, what it was they were to get elsewhere in the Bill, and what was the price to be paid. They ought to know whether the Archbishop and his friends would receive in the later portions of the Bill the considerations which they thought they were promised when they consented to become parties to this settlement. He pressed for an answer to the question whether the position of the negotiations was as hopeful now as when the Bill was introduced, and whether the grave doubts expressed in the Archbishop's letter on Saturday had been removed in the course of the negotiations since. Might he say one word as to the position of the Roman Catholics? Of course, they knew nothing of what had passed between the Government and the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church, but it was evident to anybody who wanted a solution of this question, that the Government had not only to effect a settlement reasonable and satisfactory to Nonconformists and to the members of the Church of England, but also one which would be reasonable and satisfactory to the Roman Catholics also. He regretted that an hon. Member opposite had made an attack upon his noble friend Lord Rothschild which was wholly unnecessary and irrelevant. It was an abuse of the hon. Member's position to make insinuations that seemed all the more reprehensible and all the less pardonable when they recollected that the communion to which Lord Rothschild belonged maintained at considerable expense their own special schools. Any member of the Jewish communion would recognise that the services of Lord Rothschild, with his family, to those schools were such as should protect him against the insinuations of the hon. Member. It was necessary to have a solution, if it was to be enduring, which would be reasonable and satisfactory to all those bodies. But they were asking all who had grave doubts about the possibility of arriving at a settlement, and all who were without knowledge as to the present position of the negotiations on various points, to accept now what was the foundation of the whole scheme. He earnestly desired a settlement, and he put it to the Government whether, by withholding information of this kind, they would really promote the passage of the Bill. He thought that in a matter of this character the Government ought to deal frankly and fully with the House, and play with all the cards on the table.

MR. RUNCIMAN said there was no objection whatever to replying to the inquiries made by both right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and he proposed to answer them in a few words. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Worcestershire had asked him whether they were as hopeful now as they were last week of arriving at a settlement of this question. He would tell him emphatically that they were. They had no reason to believe the contrary. If either of the right hon. Gentlemen could tell him that he had information from the Archbishop authorising him to say that he did not agree to the passing of this subsection until they had finally closed up in water-tight form every detail and every minor point as respected the amount of grants, the pooling of grants, and the rents, then he could only say that was new information which he received with great apprehension. But he had no ground for believing that anything of the kind existed. The latest knowledge he had led him to believe that the Archbishop was not prepared to destroy the Bill at the present moment because they had not arrived at a complete agreement as to the financial clauses. There was nothing new in the correspondence on Saturday. The Archbishop, when the Government introduced their Bill, stated in his letter the fact that, as regarded the money, he could not give a final reply. There was nothing new in that. The Archbishop had said exactly the same thing before. The Government were going into these details with those who represented the English Church, or they thought represented the English Church, and he hoped that, before they had done with this Bill in the House of Commons, they would be able to state definitely whether the representatives of the Church did or did not agree with the terms of the Bill. But they could only proceed with one subsection at a time, and he was asking the House to do a perfectly justifiable thing, namely, to pass the first subsection, when he said that all outstanding features had been settled, with the exception of the provision in regard to rents, the figures as to the grants, and certain matters of minor interpretation. It would be entirely contrary to the practice of the House to say that they would not take this first subsection because there might be some outstanding features that could be discussed later on, not only on the Committee stage, but on the Report stage. [OPPOSITION cries of "Will they be discussed?"] He ventured to say that these important matters would be discussed on the Report stage, and the Government had no wish to prevent their being discussed on the Report stage.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN pointed out that whilst they could reduce the grants on the Report stage, there was no power, even the Government had not the power, to move an increase of them. He thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to have that in his mind.

MR. RUNCIMAN said he had that in mind. What they were now discussing was the first subsection of Clause 1. The other point raised by the right hon. Gentleman was that if they passed this clause, they would be taking an irrevocable step. He was not asking them to take an irrevocable step. They never took an irrevocable step on the Committee Stage of the Bill. He was not quite sure that, if they gave to the contracting-out schools far more than they did in the schedule, the Leader of the Opposition would even then vote for it, for he understood that the right hon. Gentleman objected to the principles of the Bill as it was framed. All he could say was that they were doing their best to close up the small points, and they ought not to be prevented from getting subsection (1) of this clause, merely because they were now discussing and hoped to agree on other points.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said the right hon. Gentleman asked him whether he had any information that the Archbishop was unwilling to pass subsection (1), or was in a mood which would make a settlement of later clauses difficult. It was not he who was in communication with the Archbishop; it was not he who had had correspondence with his Grace; it was not he who was the authorised channel of the Archbishop's views in that House, and he could do no more than give the impression left on his mind by the correspondence. Anybody who had read that correspondence with an impartial eye must be aware that it showed that the Archbishop was deeply disquieted about what the right hon. Gentleman seemed to regard as details of the Bill. They were not details, but essential things as to which the Archbishop said there was to be a settlement. Even some of the speeches made on the other side offered sufficient warning that there might be grave doubts as to whether a settlement really could be arrived at upon this Bill. Let them assume for the sake of argument that they came to terms with the Archbishop. There was still left the question as regarded Roman Catholics. He was perfectly ready to discuss the subsection on those terms but, accepting the premise it was not treating them fairly to suggest that they were now discussing the principles which the Archbishop was anxious or ready to see pass and that other outstanding differences were questions of detail. That was really not so. The right hon. Gentleman said they must deal with each subsection by itself. That was precisely in contradiction to what was said by the Prime Minister and by the right hon. Gentleman himself on the Second Reading. They then said: "You cannot treat these questions by themselves. They are all part of one organic settlement. You cannot pass one without accepting the other. You cannot drop one without affecting the other." Accepting that view of the Bill he asked what was the organic settlement. Was it the Bill as it appeared before them? They knew it was not. They knew that conclusively from the correspondence. They knew that in this organic settlement they could not discuss one fraction without knowing what the other fractions were; it was like a tessellated pavement, each portion of which depended upon the others; they were at all events aware that while there might be agreement that this subsection should pass if the other parts of the Bill were satisfactory, there was no agreement that it should pass if the other subsections were unsatisfactory. The whole correspondence with the Archbishop and the Bishop of London showed that the other integral portions of this balanced arrangement were not settled. When the Government told them that this was an arrangement which must be taken or left as a whole, it was the most plain and obvious corollary that they should know what the whole was of which this subsection was a part. It was not true that the other thing was a matter of detail. It was not true that the amount of money which the Roman Catholics got was a detail. It was not true that the terms on which entry was to be carried out or the terms on which transfer was to take place were details. They were essential and fundamental parts of one big bargain, and while he still, unhappily, had his doubts as to whether even if they carried out the bargain they would have a settlement, everyone admitted that if they did not carry out the bargain they could not have a settlement. It was perfect folly to part with one half of the bargain until they knew what the other half was. That seemed to him so plain and so obvious a fact that common fairness of dealing between the Government and the Committee required them to tell the Committee how they thought they could meet the claims of the Archbishop and the Bishop of London on the one side and the Roman Catholics on the other, before they passed from the subsection. It seemed so plain that he was amazed that hon. Gentlemen opposite did not see the thing in the same light. He was not conscious of having put before them anything in the nature of a paradox. The whole argument of such observations as he had laid before them was based upon the Prime Minister's own declaration that this was a self-contained scheme, indefensible in each of its parts but defensible regarded as a whole. Then they must know the whole, and the Government were most gravely to blame in asking them to discuss any of the parts until they were absolutely assured that the whole was that self-contained, harmonious, and organic unity which alone would justify the House in hoping against hope that it was to be a final settlement of the question.

MR. MADDISON (Burnley) entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken as to the view put by the Prime Minister, namely, that this was a self-contained scheme, and that as a matter of fact it was not a Bill at all, and he did not regard it as a Bill but as a mere bargain. When he heard that, he felt himself totally unable to vote for the Second Reading, because he did not believe in the bargain, and if he had voted for the Second Reading he should not have been free to alter this or the other part of the bargain that did not suit him. He had never felt more humiliated in his life than that afternoon. They had been discussing the Archbishop of Canterbury. He had come there foolishly thinking that it was a Bill. They had had any amount of talk about the Archbishop and occasionally a Catholic Archbishop had been brought in, and on one solitary occasion he believed there was a reference to the Nonconformist leaders. They seemed to have receded into the dim and distant past. The person who was substantial and real was the Archbishop of Canterbury. It would help their debates if the Minister for Education would get a certificate from the Archbishop for each clause that he could read out and then there would be no doubt about it. The other alternative was to give the Archbishop a seat on that bench and then perhaps he would speak for himself. After what the right hon. Gentleman had said, as he understood it, he was still carrying out his bargain. It was always difficult to deal with bishops; when they got to archbishops it was nearly impossible, and when the Archbishop had not made up his mind he was in a dilemma. But the right hon. Gentleman was under an entire misapprehension. Hon. Members had not read the Bill. This was a Bill to make proper provision with respect to elementary education and not elementary religion. If they kept to education they would have no need of the Archbishop.

Mr. A. J. Bal'our.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.) said that no one could deny that the clause and the Amendment raised a point of enormous interest to all voluntary schools and of particular interest to the schools in which he and his friends were interested. They did not pretend to be exactly the spokesmen of English Catholics, but they claimed that they were speaking in a particular manner for the Irish Catholics in this country. If those of Irish extraction were taken from the schools and the congregation they might as well shut up the greater part of the Catholic churches and schools of the country. The figures given the other night by the noble Lord the Member for Chichester as to the position of Catholic schools in this country were dismal, but he did not think they overstated the case. As he listened to those figures and to the debate he could not help regretting that the compromise practically arrived at two years ago by the ingenuity and the ability of his friends and of the Chief Secretary was not carried out. He very much feared they would never get a settlement of the Catholic question so favourable to the schools for which they spoke. He hoped the last word had not been spoken. He asked Nonconformist Members to recollect that they had suffered much in the past for their principles, and he hoped they would not inflict upon Catholics further injustice. By offering them a system of education which they could not accept they were offering them an impossibility and imposing fresh disabilities upon them. He appealed to them. They had an honourable record of which they might be proud, and he asked them to approach the whole of this question in the same spirit in which they had solved the question of University education in Ireland.

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) said he did not think he should be adequately doing his duty to his constituents if he did not pronounce a few words at this stage of the discussion. It seemed to him that this quasi agreement was of a remarkable and precarious character. On the one hand they had concessions made by the friends of the voluntary schools which were of an assured and certain character, and on the other hand they had proposals made by the Government with regard to contracting-out which were of a most uncertain and doubtful character, and which must necessarily create some anxiety in the minds of the supporters of voluntary schools. There was uncertainty as to both the amount and the permanency of the grant to contracted-out schools. It was quite possible that some time in the future a Government might be in power which, viewing contracted-out schools with abhorrence, would discontinue the grant. He would not be doing his duty as Vice-President in association with Lord Halifax of the Yorkshire House of Laymen if he did not say from his certain knowledge that there was a most profound anxiety felt throughout the Northern Province on this subject. He had a great desire for a settlement that would at least last for some years. Unless any arrangement arrived at met with the support of all parties it could not be permanent, and they would find themselves in an even worse position in the course of the next year or two than that they were in now. He felt very keenly that these discussions were injurious to the cause of education which must play a great part in the prosperity or decadence of this nation.

MR. STUART (Sunderland) asked the President of the Board of Education to give the Committee some information as to how far this was and was not an agreed measure. He was extremely desirous of passing this compromise, because he wished to have peace in the educational world for some little time at least. He thought both sides were giving up something and getting something, but what he wanted to know was whether if he endeavoured to amend the Bill he would endanger it by trenching upon the compromise. He wished to know how far this was an agreed Bill. For instance, he would like to know whether there was anything in the recent arrangement made to prevent him differentiating the Catholic position from the Church of England position. In dealing with religious schools he believed that many very much was not reduced to half an hour. Would he be at liberty to vote for that diminution without endangering the compromise? There were many things he would like amended which he would not risk moving Amendments upon if it would endanger the Bill. He thought they might be taken a little more into the confidence of the Government. In the year 1884 when there was a dispute between Lords and Commons about the extension of the agricultural franchise and the redistribution of seats there was an agreement arrived at between the members of the Government and the Opposition in the House of Lords, and the very same difficulty arose as the one with which they were now face to face. He wanted to know from the Government how much of this measure was capable of being altered and how much was absolutely agreed upon. Speaking as one who was urgently desirous of accommodating himself to the carrying through of this compromise he thought there was a great deal to be said for the pressure which was being put upon the Government on this point.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk) agreed that there was a good deal to be said for the view that the Government should tell the House how much was agreed and how much was not agreed. They also required enlightening as to the precise terms upon which contracting-out was to be arranged. From a business point of view, even if the contracting-out terms were satisfactory this subsection would be open to the same objections. He looked upon contracting-out as a great evil under any circumstances, and under the Bill it would take place in exactly the places where it was least needed—namely, where there were other schools. That seemed eminently undesirable. He wanted to draw attention to the case which seemed to him to have been rather neglected hitherto by those who had been carrying on these negotiations on behalf of the Church, the case of the single school areas where there was going to be no alternative to contracting-out. There this subsection would be the death-warrant of the non-provided schools. The only course open to these schools was to become provided schools and come under the Act. He did not wish to argue the point on its merits, but if it were not part of the bargain nobody on the Opposition side of the House would support this proposal for a moment. It was a quite untenable position to the majority of those interested in denominational teaching in the single-school areas. They would find if this Bill passed into law that instead of having denominational teaching in those schools which were built for that purpose facilities for such teaching would be reduced almost to a nullity. It seemed to be supposed that it would be quite easy in those schools to get that denominational teaching given, but in scattered districts where there were many schools in a single parish and the clergymen had more work than they could get through and where the headmaster might be unwilling to give the teaching, the facility for giving that teaching in those schools would amount to very little indeed, and the whole purpose for which the school was built would have been destroyed. Then there was the question of expense. They were going to ask the denomination to pay for the religious teaching and they were to pay them rent for the schools. What was the difference between the Bill and the present law in this respect? In both cases the school was owned by the denomination or the trust and utilised by the local education authority. At the present time rent was not paid, but in future rent would be paid, but they would not have the same right of giving denominational teaching. Under these new proposals the denominational teaching would be less, and there would be a considerable balance to the owners or trustees of those schools after they had paid the local education authority for that particular portion of the teachers' salary devoted to denominational instruction. Where was that to come from? He should like to ask the President of the Board of Education if there were any actuarial statistics to show the additional cost which would fall upon the rates. People in the rural districts would see that while their children were not receiving the same religious instruction as before their rates would be heavily increased. This would not be acceptable in those districts, and especially in the single-school districts. They could not expect the owners of those schools to be willing to give them up to the local authority without remuneration unless similar facilities for religious instruction were given as hitherto. On these grounds he would vote for the Amendment.

*SIR GEORGE WHITE (Norfolk, N.W.) said he was sure the bulk of hon. Members would feel regret at the tone which this discussion had taken. He had endeavoured to follow the debate in order to obtain some idea of the principle upon which this proposal was based. The noble Lord asked whether the Archbishop of Canterbury assented to this subsection, and his right hon. friend replied that he had assented to it, although reluctantly.

LORD R. CECIL: I am afraid that I failed to make myself clear to the hon. Gentleman. The whole point of my speech was that we have no ground for thinking that the Archbishop of Canterbury assented to this subsection except upon certain terms, and that we are not sure, in fact we have every reason to believe that he was not satisfied with the terms proposed.

*SIR GEORGE WHITE: The noble Lord distinctly said that the Archbishop of Canterbury had reluctantly assented.

LORD R. CECIL: Conditionally.

*SIR GEORGE WHITE: On the conditions set forth here. [Opposition cries of "No."] Certainly, so far as he was aware that assent to the first subsection depended upon what, he believed, was the substance of the whole debate, namely, the amount of grant to be allowed to the contracted-out schools. The answer given by the President of the Board of Education was all the answer he could give on the matter. The right hon. Gentleman read the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the Archbishop of Canterbury which showed plainly that the actual financial conditions had not been finally settled. He gathered from the correspondence that this was still an open question, and he thought that should have satisfied the House that, whilst that was a debatable point, his right hon. friend could give no further information at this stage. But did not that bring the discussion down to a certain number of shillings that would settle or unsettle the whole question? He understood the desire of the Leader of the Opposition and others who had spoken was to know exactly on what basis the contracting-out grant was to be fixed. Surely, if there was nothing in this contracting-out clause beyond the question of a few shillings, that should not be used as a means of wrecking this arrangement, which seemed to be the object of some hon. Members who had addressed the House. The noble Lord had said that information had been given that the Nonconformists whom he himself represented were determined to make no further concessions. He should like to point out to the noble Lord that they had no knowledge whatever, any more than the House generally, of the terms of contracting-out. He was quite sure unless it could be shown that these terms were altogether inadequate that was a point on which they would be sorry to wreck the Bill. They must, however, put this limitation upon that statement—they did feel that the denominations who claimed the liberty which contracting-out would give them should be prepared to give something, as they had professed themselves willing to do, for that liberty. With that limitation he was quite sure that hon. Members on that side of the House would, so far as the financial question was concerned, meet it with an open mind and a desire to get at what was fair and reasonable as between all the parties. So much had been introduced into this discussion that if he were to attempt to follow the arguments of the speakers opposite he was afraid that he should embark on a Second Reading debate, rather than confine himself to the discussion of Clause 1. If the clause was tion of doing justice to the denominations who desired in part or in whole to contract out, then he did not think they ought to come to a division on that question which was admitted to be unsettled. He felt, as one who voted for the Second Reading of this measure, that it was not open to him to move any Amendment affecting vital principles on the one side or the other, but at the same time he felt at liberty to put down Amendments affecting the administration or the machinery of the Bill, with due regard to questions of principle. If his right hon. friend pointed out that any of the Amendments he put down was going contrary to what was regarded as a principle involved, he should feel in honour bound to withdraw the Amendment. That was the spirit in which he thought the Bill should be approached by those who voted for the Second Reading. Those who did not vote for the Second Reading of the Bill were free to take what course they pleased. The hon. Member for Burnley was antagonistic to the Bill, not particularly because of the compromise—he would have been equally antagonistic to the Bill which was withdrawn—but because he was a strong and logical supporter of the purely secular position. He could understand hon. Members who supported the secular position; he thought they were perfectly justified in taking up that position; but if those who supported the Second Reading in the hope that they might be able to come to a reasonable settlement attempted to bring in Amendments which distinctly conflicted with the main principles of the Bill they showed either that their vote in the first instance was given under a misapprehension, or that they had seen reason to alter their minds in that respect. He assured hon. Members opposite that they were not alone in the conviction that a clause like this was going to work mischief in some respects. They were told from that side of the House the same thing, but if con-than once his sympathy for the Catholic position. He hoped his Catholic friends would remember that they made claims in regard to education in this country which they did not make in other countries, or, if they made them, they did not obtain. When the hon. Member and his friends pleaded for the Catholic consciences to be respected, they must make a similar appeal to Catholics. When Catholics attempted to impose conditions, and said that they must have a Catholic atmosphere in their schools, he thought they were putting a tax upon them which it was impossible to meet, however willing.

LORD EDMUND TALBOT (Sussex, Chichester): The Catholics of this country found the land on which their schools are built, and they paid for the buildings.

*SIR GEORGE WHITE said he could not answer the noble Lord on that question without being led far from the Amendment and he did not wish to be called to order by the Chairman. He would simply say that Catholics in demanding conditions which they did not obtain from other English-speaking races were putting them to a test to which they could not fairly respond. He believed the Government were willing to deal with the Catholic schools as liberally as the circumstances would allow. He trusted his hon. friends would not take up the position of endeavouring to wreck the Bill on the contracting-out clause. If they did so, they were bound to offer some other solution than that which was before the Committee at the present moment. He thought it was most unfortunate that on this clause, the main principle of which had been sanctioned on the Second Reading, they had had a discussion which did not bode well for the future progress of the Bill through the House. He believed there was a large and increasing number of people in the country who saw in this Bill a suggested mode of settlement which was on the whole in the complicated character of our education system the fairest which could be obtained. He hoped that the House would address itself to the Bill not as a positively agreed measure, but as a largely agreed measure. He believed all outstanding matters were capable of adjustment if the House would continue to pursue the course in regard to the Bill which they pursued on the Second Reading.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University) said he should like to state the difficulties which presented themselves to the minds of himself and his hon. friends when considering how they were to vote on this subsection. The subsection embodied one side of a bargain. The compromise as it had been called, or the agreed Bill, depended on the one side on the surrender of the voluntary schools, and on the other side upon certain other conditions as to right of entry, transfer, and contracting-out. What they were asked to do in dealing with this subsection was to embody in the Bill the surrender of the voluntary schools. At this moment the Committee knew nothing of two very important matters about which they ought to be informed if this Bill was to be considered as a compromise. The terms of transfer were still matter of negotiation outside the House. Contracting-out also was still matter of negotiation. That they should be informed about contracting-out was the more important because general dissatisfaction had been expressed on both sides of the House with the practice of contracting-out. It was a dissatisfaction which he himself felt profoundly. Under the ruling of the Chairman there would be no opportunity for discussing the Amendment which the hon. Member for East Mayo had put down. That Amendment would have led to the consideration of an alternative for contracting-out—an alternative which he should have liked to see embodied in the Bill. The Committee would be precluded as soon as this subsection was passed from considering the new clause of which the hon. Member for East Mayo had given notice, and under these circumstances it was all the more important that they should know what were the conditions of contracting-out. Were they such as would impoverish the schools now, and still more hereafter, or were they conditions which would ~~improve the figures now~~ improve the figures now ~~in the country~~ This measure had been an agreed Bill or compromise. They were asked to vote one portion of that compromise when they not only did not know what were the terms of the other portion but when the contracting parties outside did not know themselves. He called attention to the two leading points referred to by the Archbishop, viz., the terms offered to schools which elected to contract-out and the conditions of the transfer. On these points the Archbishop stated that he was thoroughly dissatisfied with what had been stated in the House by the Minister for Education. Now, what they wanted to know was whether the parties were agreed, or whether there was any reasonable probability that they would be agreed. Those were two points on which they ought to be satisfied before they were asked to vote for the subsection.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.) said he regretted that he was not able to be present at an earlier part of the sitting. The hon. Gentleman had made a very fair appeal to him, and he would do his best to respond. He never represented, nor did the President of the Board of Education, that this was a concluded agreement, signed, sealed, and delivered; an agreement which it was only for the House to register. He expressly guarded himself in the speech for the Second Reading from taking any such view of the matter. What he said was that the parties concerned had, in the opinion of the Government, arrived within measurable distance of a settlement. They believed that on the main points of principle both sides were prepared to give way, and that under those conditions the Government had made themselves responsible for making proposals which they hoped would form a basis of discussion, and, after modification, if modification were necessary, would be acceptable to both. It was on that understanding that the House read the Bill a second time. They were now dealing with a clause which, if carried into law, would give the local authorities in the future an absolute control over all schools to the expenses of which the rates had contributed. That was, perhaps, the main part of the sacrifice or ~~concession~~ which the Church of England made to the Nonconformists in consideration of the later clauses of the Bill, which represented the concession or sacrifice which the Nonconformists made to the Church. The hon. Gentleman was quite entitled to say: "If we agree to pass this clause, are you satisfied, or can you give us reasonable ground for believing, that the other part of the consideration is going to be satisfied also?" What was the essence of the consideration moving from the Nonconformist side? It was first of all, the right of entry conceded by Clause 2, and as to which he repeated that if there was any reasonable doubt as to whether it was adequately safeguarded by the drafting of the clause in its present form, the Government were most anxious that whatever might be obscure should be made clear, and that whatever was insufficient should be made sufficient; and the second head or branch of the consideration moving from that side was undoubtedly the system of contracting-out. There again certain clauses of the Bill provided that the contracting-out schools should receive no support from the rates, but a large part of their expenditure from the Exchequer. They regarded it as essential to this proposed compromise that there should be, in consideration of the clause now under discussion, an effective right of entry into provided schools, guaranteed to the denomination on the demand of an adequate number of parents, and that there should be a system of contracting-out, in the language agreed to between the Archbishop and himself, which should give to the contracting-out schools a reasonable prospect of existence, while providing, at the same time, that some substantial part of the bill should be borne by the denomination. That was the compact, so far as there was one, and he had every reason at that moment to hope that that part of the consideration would be fulfilled to the satisfaction of both parties. He could not say that there was at the moment a concluded agreement in regard to the precise scale fixed in the schedules either for the rent to be paid for transferred schools or the scale of grants to be paid in respect of contracting-out schools. That was a matter still under discussion. The proposals made by the Government he believed to be adequate for the purpose and that they would fulfil what was agreed with the Archbishop. In regard to the contracting-out schools, in effect they provided that 85 per cent. of the expenses should be paid out of the Exchequer, leaving only 15 per cent. to be paid by the denomination. He was not saying whether that was right or wrong, but it was a very much larger sum paid out of public funds than the percentage prior to the Act of 1902, which, if his memory served him correctly, was not more than 75 per cent. That was their proposition, and they were still awaiting any criticism in regard to these figures which had been invited, but had not yet come, and to which, when it did come, they would certainly give most respectful and sympathetic consideration. Beyond that he could not go. He agreed that the clause to which they were asking the House to assent necessitated a considerable sacrifice of the position hitherto tenaciously held by the Church, but it was in consideration of the assurance that it was their intention to proceed with Clauses 2 and 3, which involved a surrender in principle of positions as tenaciously held by the Nonconformists. He could not at that moment say that he had an absolutely concluded agreement, but he had the best reason to hope that on this point also an agreement would be made.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that unfortunately the right hon. Gentleman was not present at the beginning of the discussion. Of course, he knew that the right hon. Gentleman would have been present if he could have been. He was well aware of how heavy the burdens were which were laid upon the right hon. Gentleman and the necessity of his absenting himself from some portions of their discussions. He was convinced that the right hon. Gentleman had not only told them the truth—that he need hardly say—but that he had told them the whole of the truth, which was a much more important thing.

MR. ASQUITH: And nothing but the truth.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: But is the truth really satisfactory? Could they say that they were voting in the full knowledge of all the elements which should influence their judgment? The Prime Minister must feel that if he had only entered upon the negotiations at an earlier period, or had deferred discussion in Committee until negotiations had reached a more mature stage, the great difficulty in which they now found themselves would have been avoided. The House was really divided into two sections—the optimists and the pessimists. The optimists thought the Bill would give them a settlement. The pessimists, of whom he was one, doubted it. But was it an unreasonable protest against the course of the Government in asking them to deal with a section of the whole that was precise and clear, while leaving in obscurity later portions, it being admitted by the Prime Minister that he had not yet come to an agreement with the Archbishop of Canterbury? He imagined that the prospect of an agreement with the Roman Catholics, to whom the Prime Minister did not refer, was even more dim. The right hon. Gentleman told them he had every hope that he would be able to offer such terms in regard to the transferred and the contracting-out schools as would give reasonable satisfaction, but he had given no ground for that hope, and the only public statement they had had from the Archbishop was profoundly hostile to what the right hon. Gentleman most unhappily called a detail. The Archbishop had expressed himself in, as he thought, a most gloomy spirit upon the proposals the Government still thought fair, and there was not a single representative of the Roman Catholics who had not expressed, in the strongest permissible language, his belief that this could be no settlement. Under these circumstances he quite admitted he could ask for no further revelations from the Government, because he believed they had no further revelations to give, but he was justified in expressing his deep regret that the right hon. Gentleman asked them to come to a conclusion on this question, before all those interested in this great and bitter controversy had come to some agreement with His Majesty's Government. They had nothing to found their conduct upon except the vague—he was afraid very vague—hopes of a very optimistic administration. That appeared to him a very unsatisfactory foundation on which to base further discussion on the Committee stage of the Bill.

MR. ASQUITH said he did not think it was necessary to prolong this discussion. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of those who approached this Bill in an optimistic and in a pessimistic spirit, but he would rather be disposed to describe the two attitudes of mind as being on the one hand those who desired to obtain a settlement and on the other those who did not. He believed the great majority of Members of the House desired a settlement and it was to them he would make his appeal. Here they had the first subsection of the clause which involved a surrender and a large surrender by one of the parties. They come on presently to the second and third subsections of the clause which involved another surrender. If they found when they reached later stages that an agreement had not been arrived at and there were no elements of a satisfactory settlement, neither those who agreed with a settlement nor those who were opposed to it, would feel that there was much use in prosecuting their labours; but surely they might wait until they had reached that stage before they abandoned all hope of the great measure which was now before the House and the country.

It was in that spirit he would ask the Committee to continue its discussion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he did not wish to continue the discussion but he was bound to say that when the right hon. Gentleman chose to describe himself and a large number of Members of the House who voted against the Second Reading of the Bill as persons who did not desire a settlement he used language which was unnecessarily provocative and offensive and which no Minister would dare use if they were not working under the gag.

MR. HUNT was understood to say that he wished to know whether this was supposed to be an agreed Bill. The Minister for Education said that the contracting-out schools ought to have a reasonable chance, but what did he mean? Was it an even chance or a ten to one chance; so far as he could make out the odds were longer. The Catholics were willing to accept most reasonable terms, but it appeared that the Nonconformists wanted their own religion to be taught without paying for it; they wanted the other denominations to pay for it and receive nothing in return.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 211; Noes, 117. (Division List No. 420).

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
 Hunt and Viscount Helmsley

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston), in moving to insert the word "fully" said the point of his Amendment was that contracting-out schools had a right to some assistance from the rates. They ought to make some contribution from their own pockets in order to preserve their liberty, but they ought to get some assistance from the rates, not as a charity but a right. Supposing it were possible to allocate the rates those who desired to have a particular type of school would allocate the rate they paid to that particular type and those who wanted another type of school would allocate the rate they paid to that, and nobody could say that that would be unfair. But as that was impossible the only way in which justice could be dealt out would be to give those who desired a particular type of school a share of that money which they contributed to other schools in the shape of rates. After the discussion that had taken place however he would not press his Amendment. He begged formally to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 5 after the word 'be' to insert the word 'fully.'"

Question, "That the word 'fully' be there inserted,"—put, and negatived.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) in proposing to insert the words "except as hereinafter provided," said that if these words were not inserted here, it would be impossible on the subsequent stage to raise the question of the different classes of schools which should be maintained by the local education authority. The Secretary to the Admiralty had taunted the Catholic representatives with the fact that in 1906 they supported the principle of contracting out, and the hon. Member for Preston had said the same thing. That was a most unfair and misleading way of stating what occurred in that year. When Clause 4 of the Bill of 1906 was introduced it was entirely unsatisfactory to them in its form, and was so hemmed round with conditions that the Catholic schools could not avail themselves of its provisions. While that clause was in its original shape the hon. Member for Preston got up and moved that the schools excluded from that clause should be permitted to contract out. That they supported, because it provided as it were a back door by means of which Catholic schools might be able to get some means of living on. It was wholly misrepresenting what occurred to say that the Catholic representatives in the House supported the principle of contracting out. Throughout all the discussions of the 1906 Bill they declared that the true place for their schools was within the national system of education, and that they saw the greatest possible evils would arise if they were driven out of it. The present Chief Secretary for Ireland when he assented to the principle of contracting out, defended it on the ground that it was an exception grafted on to an exception, and that it would apply only to a minority of individual schools. But how different was that from saying that all the Catholic schools of the country must accept the principle of contracting out or perish. The hon. Member for Preston said he understood that they were willing to pay for the privilege of liberty in order to get rid of public control, and that the only way of getting rid of public control was by contracting out. The position which existed was that the Catholics of this country were demanding public control, and the Government was going to refuse it. They wished the fullest public control consistent with the protection of the conscientious convictions of their people, and the Government said: "No, you must contract out and we will give you this grant."

*MR. HAROLD COX asked whether the hon. Member was in favour of the local authority appointing the teachers in the Catholic schools.

MR. DILLON said that was so, and it was in order to make way for a clause which he had on the Paper that he was proposing this Amendment. The Catholics were asking to be included in the national system, asking for public control, and said that it was possible to conciliate the conscientious convictions of the people they represented with public control and the inclusion of the Anglican and Catholic schools in the national system. He denied that when the Government offered contracting out they were offering a privilege. They had never asked for the right to contract out, and they were, therefore, entitled to say it was no privilege. The President of the Board of Education in introducing this Bill had characterised contracting out as most objectionable from an educational point of view, but at the same time had asserted that it was impossible to come to a settlement without contracting-out. He traversed that assertion and denied it. It was quite possible, and if the Government accepted his clause, it could be done now. The right hon. Gentleman could arrive at an agreement with the Catholic school managers without any recourse to contracting-out, which he quite agreed was extremely objectionable from an educational point of view. He denied that contracting-out was a privilege, especially with the conditions that had to be observed, which were that there must be none in single school districts; there must be thirty children in attendance; and the schools must attain equal efficiency with the council schools, in staff, prices, and secular instruction. The last condition under present circumstances was impossible, and it was a most evil and monstrous thing to present as a settlement a contracting-out scheme saddled with that condition. It was impossible now, and would become more and more impossible as education progressed. By setting up this system they admitted that it was a question of conscience with the Catholics of this country. The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk in his very sympathetic speech had said that when Catholics asked that Catholic schools and Catholic teachers should be paid for at the public expense they were asking for what could not be granted. The Government were offering to Catholic schools under this contracting-out clause £6,000 a year, which the Archbishop of Westminster was to distribute among them, with the smallest possible amount of public control. They could have in the Catholic schools freedom from public control, and all these things which they did not ask, but they must put their hands into their pockets, and pay the difference, pay a fine for their consciences. That nobody could deny who looked at the Bill with a fair mind. With regard to the great question of denominational education being paid for out of the rates they had all heard over and over again the famous alliteration "Rome on the rates." It was a phrase coined by Dr. Clifford, for whom he had a great respect, though he had always fought against him. When Dr. Clifford spoke of "Rome on the rates" he only used that phrase for the sake of its alliteration. What he really meant was "Anglicanism on the rates." He was sure the Rev. John Clifford did not care so much about Rome being on the rates; it was the Anglican Church to which he objected being put on the rates. What difference did it make whether Rome was on the rates or on the taxes? All they asked was that the children in the Catholic schools should not be condemned to an inferior system of education, because of conscientious objections. The Government were proposing under this Bill to pay the rent of the Anglican schools and they paid that rent although they gave them facilities for putting their children into these public schools and teaching Anglican doctrines there, and they must also remember that under this system of Cowper-Temple teaching they had a form of religious teaching which to three-fourths of the laymen of the Church of England was satisfactory. Why could not the Government relieve the consciences of men like the Rev. Dr. Clifford, by setting off against the cost of teaching Catholic doctrine and catechism, the rent of the Catholic schools? It would have more than paid and if by taking over the schools they allowed a small rent they would set that off against the cost of teaching Catholic doctrine and by that means they would lift Rome, not only off the rates, but off the taxes also, and they would convince people that they were not paying the expenses of teaching Catholic doctrine. What was it he proposed as an alternative? He was opposed on every ground to contracting-out. He was glad to recognise that the Prime Minister was not going to adhere very strictly to the scale of the schedules, but even so, he still feared there would be a heavy and serious burden thrown upon the Catholic people, and no matter what improvement was made in the amount of the grant the opinion would prevail that the education was to be on a lower scale. Now he directed attention to his alternative proposal. His alternative was to revive the clause of the Bill of 1906, which after prolonged discussion was agreed to by the representatives of the Catholic schools and by the Liberal Government as speaking for the Nonconformists. It was quite true that many of the Nonconformists were not enamoured of the clause. They were discontented, but a good deal had happened since then, and the fact had to be remembered that the Government and the Catholic schools accepted that scheme by which the Catholic schools could come in, although he knew many Nonconformists objected to it he would ask was there any Nonconformists to-day who would get up and say that they preferred the concession they were making under this Bill to that which was made by the Bill of 1906? In the interests of education and of the Catholic schools he appealed to the Nonconformists upon the other side of the House to say whether they could not agree to give back that clause of the Bill of 1906, and at least to allow the Catholic schools to make the experiment of coming into the national system. The terrible danger that oppressed him in connection with this matter arose when he looked to the future which many of the leaders even of their own Church had failed to do. He looked with the utmost dread on any measure that would stereotype the Catholic schools as an excrescence upon the national system. One reason was this. This Bill whether it passed or not had an enormous weight of public opinion behind it; the vote on the Second Reading proved that. Had it not been for the solid vote of the Irish Party the division would have been ridiculous. This was, in point of fact, a Protestant settlement. He did not say that it included all the Protestants, but it certainly had behind it the overwhelming mass of the Protestants of this country, and, with the great Protestant forces supporting it, the Bill was moving inevitably towards a Protestant settlement. The Bill might be wrecked, but if it were, another Bill would be introduced on the same lines, with, it might be, some modifications. The great questions on which the Bill would be fought in the course of these discussions were not questions which interested Catholics in the slightest degree. The right of entry and questions of that kind, of the utmost importance where Protestant schools were being transferred, did not interest Catholics in the smallest particular. As was pointed out the other day by the hon. Member for Cambridge University and also by the hon. Member for Oxford University, in many cases the Anglican schools were being rapidly transferred to the public authorities, and the number of children in the public schools was increasing day by day. That was not the case with Catholic schools, which remained in the same position. Therefore he was afraid, looking into the future, that Catholic schools would be left outside of the national settlement, and that whatever Anglican schools might contract-out, they would gradually drift, under Protestant influence, into the national system. Catholic schools would remain struggling outside until they were left isolated and alone. Too poor to protect themselves and secure fair play, they would eventually find themselves completely outside the general Protestant settlement. Catholics in this country were only 2,000,000 as against 40,000,000, and he was afraid, looking into the future, that they would hear it said that the public rates and taxes ought not to be burdened by the support of Catholic schools. The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk had used these warning words, namely, that in making these demands Catholics were asking for privileges which were not given to Roman Catholics in any other English-speaking country of the world. That was perfectly true. Although Catholics were a third of the population, and among the wealthiest of the whole of the Australians, they did not get 1s. for any of their schools, nor even in the United States did Catholic schools receive anything from public funds. But he might inform the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk that he had talked with some of the leaders of public opinion in Australia who had stated that there was an undercurrent of doubt as to whether they had acted wisely in this respect towards Catholic schools. He thought there was an increasing feeling in that direction. He repeated that he feared, looking into the future, that Catholics would be left outside of the Protestant settlement, and they would become so isolated that someone would get up in that Assembly and say: "Why should they remain on the taxes?" Therefore, he made a strong appeal to all fair-minded men in the House, who desired to see fair play and justice done to all fellow-citizens, and who repudiated, as he was sure Nonconformists sitting beside him would repudiate with warmth, any notion that they would be party to inflicting injuries or civic disabilities on Catholics in this country. For conscience sake, and though they differed from Catholics widely, he appealed to the Nonconformists to open the door so that the Catholic schools for which he spoke might come into the national settlement, and not be caused to contract-out, which had been condemned educationally by everyone, and by the very Minister who had introduced this Bill. He had received that morning, like other Members he dared say, a document which added still further to his fears. It was an important document from the Manchester Diocesan Council which passed a series of resolutions the other day. The Bishop of Manchester, who had taken a prominent part in discussing the Bill, was present. The last of the resolutions was to the effect that the proposal as to contracting-out was an express contradiction of the principle of public or local control; that the children attending such schools would be unjustly deprived of the benefit of the rates paid by their parents; and finally—

"That the provision was unjust in itself and framed with a view of conciliating one section of the community, and ought to be taken out of the Bill."

He was grateful to the Leader of the Opposition and to the other hon. Members above the gangway who had spoken on their behalf, but he did not think as Catholics they would be wise in trusting their future to an alliance with them, because it could not in the nature of things remain. Hon. Members who were the representatives of the Protestants in this country would either now or in the near future come to an arrangement, because they had principles in common. Roman Catholic Members could not come to an arrangement that would suit Protestants. They had principles which they could not surrender, principles which had nothing to do with Cowper-Temple teaching or the right of entry, and they would be allowing themselves to be forced into a dangerous and indefensible position if they allowed their schools to be permanently shut out of a national system in this country and penned into small preserves of their own. He appealed to the Nonconformist leaders to reconsider their decision, and to ask themselves whether they would not be acting more in consonance with their own principles of justice, fair play, and generosity, if they revived Clause 4 of the Bill of 1906 and allowed the Catholics to come into the national system.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 6, after the word 'authority' to insert the words 'except as hereinafter provided.'"—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RUNCIMAN said it was difficult for the Government to withstand the appeal made by the hon. Gentleman, and on more than one ground. They knew perfectly well that the nonconformists of this country had long had sympathy with the Roman Catholics in their struggles, first of all to get rid of their disabilities, and secondly, to secure for themselves a place in the educational system of the country, and they had all admired the efforts made by the Roman Catholics to keep alive their own schools, conducted entirely on their own principles, not only in this country but elsewhere. He was sure the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House would acquit him and his colleagues of any trace of bigotry which had made the existence of Roman Catholics in some parts of England, Wales and Scotland, almost intolerable. But when he asked the Government to revive Clause 4 of the 1906 Bill in its final form, he was sorry to say he could not satisfy him. When the old Clause 4 in its final form left the House, it went up to the House of Lords, and every Catholic Peer voted against it. If his recollection was correct he believed the hon. Gentleman himself warned the Catholic Peers that by refusing to accept Clause 4 in its final form they were really striking a serious blow at the Roman Catholic position in this country.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): I think the right hon. Gentleman is mistaken. Clause 4 in its final form was never voted upon—that is to say, the words in the concluding paragraph as it stands on the Paper—

"Provided that the local education authority shall appoint persons acceptable to the Parents Committee to be teachers of the school."

That was certainly not in the clause when it was voted against in the House.

MR. RUNCIMAN said the hon. Gentleman was correct. The clause had four forms, and it was voted against by the House of Lords in its penultimate form. It was unacceptable to the hon. Gentleman and his friends, and when it was objected to by the Catholic Peers, the hon. Member for Mayo warned the Catholic

Peers that by refusing this compromise they were striking a blow at the Roman Catholic position in this country. As far as he remembered, the hon. Gentleman himself had no sympathy with their extreme action. He asked the House to look at the position he (Mr. Runciman) found himself in when dealing with Clause 4. He could not carry Nonconformist opinion with him in the country on Clause 4. It was quite impossible for him to do so, and it must be perfectly clear that he could go no distance whatever in the negotiations if he had not had behind him practically the solid Nonconformist opinion of the country. Indeed there would be no ending to this long controversy if Nonconformist opinion as a whole was not in favour of the terms arrived at. If Clause 4 had been one of these terms he could not have carried the Nonconformists with him. That must be his reason for saying that at present they could not accept Clause 4. The hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House said the Catholic position was no different now from what it was two or three years ago. If he might accept the opinion of the head of the Roman Catholic Church he might take it that the Catholic Church did not wish to have public control over the management of their schools. He would like to read to the House a considered statement of Archbishop Bourne made just previous to the last general election wherein he said—

"To take the management of schools intended for Catholic children out of the hands of those who represent the religious convictions of their parents and to place it in the hands of public ratepayers who cannot represent those convictions is a violation of parental rights to be resisted as an unwarrantable attack upon religious liberty."

He gathered from that state Archbishop Bourne and the Catholics in this country could full public control. The Government laid it down as a principle if they could not depart, that was to be given the schools over to full public control management must be under the hands of those who subscribed for the management of those schools, and finally the salaries should be thrown open to the hands of all denominations so long as the whole of their salaries were paid of public funds. The Catholics wished to have preserved 5,000 teacherships to members of the Roman Catholic Church. That was a very large piece of private patronage. He did not object to hon. Gentlemen opposite wishing to retain it, but so long as they retained it they could not have the same terms as were given to those trustees who were prepared to allow their teacherships to be filled by men of all denominations. Rate aid and full control were necessary corollaries, and he could see no way of their departing from that principle. The hon. Gentleman had stated that some provisions in the Bill might be of advantage to Anglicans as well as Roman Catholics. They had endeavoured as far as they possibly could to treat Anglicans and Roman Catholics alike, and where they had provided for the payment of rent and the transfer of schools that rent was payable equally in the case of Roman Catholics and Anglicans. He quite recognised the position taken up by the Catholics in regard to their schools. They said they could not, and never had, transferred any one of their schools. He admired their adhesion to that principle, but if they refused to come into the national system, under the conditions in which a national system must be controlled, he deeply regretted their decision, but they could not possibly be treated in the same way as those who came under entire public control, and which were manned by teachers of all denominations. Teacherships could not be treated as a preserve for any one church. When he said it was impossible to arrive at an agreement with Roman Catholics except by contracting-out, he said it because they could not have an agreement to which the Nonconformists would be parties. He believed that the only way in which they could provide for the continued existence of Roman Catholic schools in this country in a position of efficiency was to give them a sufficient contracting-out grant. Everything turned on the amount. There had been really most grotesque exaggerations of the amount which would have to be found by Roman Catholics under the Government's contracting-out scheme. It had been said that they provided for giving about 50s. per child contracting-out grant to the Roman Catholic schools, and this was compared with the cost of education in London, which was declared to be £5 18s. per child. This £5 18s. included not only maintenance but loan and sinking fund charges. The comparison was, consequently, absurd. He had no wish to oppress Roman Catholics in matters of money. The Government had done their best to find out what was their view. Only that morning at the Board of Education they were presented with figures as to the cost of Roman Catholic schools, which did not give, he thought, a correct account of the total cost of the upkeep of those schools. The Catholics had been good enough to send up their figures to the Department, and if they could prove their case as it had been stated in the public prints, that they would have to find £300,000 a year to keep their schools in existence, the Government would be prepared to reconsider the financial provisions. But he was certain that that figure was vastly exaggerated and no such enormous sum was likely to fall on the Roman Catholics if the 50s. grant went through. When he compared it with the amount of the grant in Scotland he was encouraged to think that the figures they had suggested were just and fair. In Scotland the contracted-out schools at the present moment got between 38s. and 40s. The hon. Members from Ireland told them they would be satisfied with a 10s. rise on that. He could not help thinking of the comparative cost of education in England and in Scotland. Scotland spent generously on education, and if 40s. was enough in Scotland he could only hope and believe 50s. was enough in England, and he hoped they would be satisfied with the sum with which they were satisfied in Scotland. He wished they would come frankly into the national system. He was perfectly certain there was not a single authority in the United Kingdom which would not give the fullest facilities for the teaching of Catholic children. He was sure the authorities would go a very long way towards meeting the peculiarities of the Roman Catholic case—further than they were at present prepared to admit. But as they insisted on standing out and retaining private patronage, he regretted that he could not see any arrangement which would allow their incomes to be

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said he deeply deplored the answer which had just been given by the President of the Board of Education. The right hon. Gentleman had altogether misunderstood the point of the Amendment, for he had reduced it simply to a question of finance. It was not a question of finance, but one of principle, of religious equality, and educational efficiency. The Government claimed that they were willing to meet the Irish Catholics in regard to the grants as far as they possibly could, but his argument on this point was that they could not make a school with a grant minus the rates as efficient as a school with a grant plus the rates. The right hon. Gentleman's statement that the Catholic Peers voted against Clause 4 of the Bill of 1906 was unfounded, because they did not vote against the final form of that clause. It was true they voted against the penultimate form but not against the final form. But supposing they did. Did the right hon. Gentleman lay down that the Catholic Peers of the Conservative Party were entitled to speak for the Nationalist Party in this House with regard to Catholic education? He had not the smallest doubt that some of those Peers would vote against the Second Reading of the Irish Land Bill this session if it reached the House of Lords. In that case what would any hon. Member think of the Chief Secretary for Ireland if he withdrew the Irish Land Bill because the Catholic Peers opposed it? The hon. Member for East Mayo over and over again had condemned the attitude of the Catholic Peers on this question. The President of the Board of Education said he could not get the Nonconformist party to support him in bringing forward again Clause 4 of the Bill of 1906, but was that a worthy position for the Minister for Education to take up? He would remind the House that the Clause 4 referred to in its ultimate form was sanctioned by the Prime Minister of that day, by the Minister for Education of that day, by the present Prime Minister, and by the Government as a whole of 1906. What right, therefore, had the present Government to recede from the position taken up in 1906 if it was a just position? If the position was just in 1906, why was it unjust to-day? This was a most extraordinary doctrine of political expediency, and he never expected such a doctrine to emanate from the ingenious mind of the Minister for Education. It was not only extraordinary but it was a political cynicism that rights granted in 1906 should be withheld in 1908 simply because a certain extreme section of the followers of the Government objected. He wished to deal in a word or two with that familiar cry of "Rome on the rates." He was sorry that he was not in a position to argue this point as if he were dealing not with Catholic but with Jewish schools, because the position was practically the same. The Jews were separated from every Christian community by an impassable gulf of dogma, but they were no more separated from the Protestants of this country than the Catholics were. In many cases the Jews had built and supported their own schools, and in their fidelity to their schools under persecution there was a great analogy between them and the Catholics. As their sufferings and convictions were similar, he contended that they ought to receive the same treatment. He did not wish to be offensive, but what would be said of him if he started the cry of "Jerusalem on the rates"? He would at once be told that he was using the language of bigotry, but he would be quite as much justified in using that phrase as others were in using the cry of "Rome on the rates." One of the most high-minded men in this country, the Chief Rabbi, said the other day he was afraid that the private and voluntary Jewish schools would disappear under this Bill, and would be merged into the national system. The Minister for Education had been very eloquent in regard to the unacceptability of the claim to have Catholic teaching in Catholic schools. If there was to be Catholic teaching by the head teacher, would any man in his senses propose that it should be given by anybody but a Catholic; would he suggest that a Baptist or a Congregationalist or Dr. Clifford should go to a Catholic school and teach or try to teach the Catholic children doctrines in which they profoundly disbelieved, thus placing themselves in the dilemma of teaching doctrines which they did not believe and making hypocrites of themselves, or else teaching doctrines in which they did believe but which were antagonistic to the religion of the parents of the children? In North-East Manchester and the East End of London, where there were a large number of Jewish and Catholic schools, they would be called public schools, and they would be declared to be entirely under public control. They would be declared to be entirely free from any tests as applied to the teachers, and they would be precluded from giving anything but simple Bible-teaching. Let him pass from these childish formulas to the realities. In some of the schools in the East End of London nearly every child would be a Jew and nearly every teacher, and certainly the head teacher, would be a Jew, and there would be simple Bible-teaching in that school. It would, however, be limited to the Old Testament; and yet they were told that although they should admit to the national system a Jewish school with Jewish religious teaching given by Jewish teachers, they should exclude a Catholic school with Catholic teaching and Catholic teachers. Without expressing sympathy with the Jewish position, he had some right to complain that their fellow-Christians in this country would not extend the same charity and consideration to those who were separated from them by a similar impassable dogma to that which separated them from the Jews. The party of popular control and anti-clericalism were now opposing an Amendment which proposed popular control and minimised clerical control. That was an extraordinary antithesis and reversal of positions. What would happen? He did not wish to be misunderstood on this point. He had in his constituency in Liverpool a number of Catholic priests who, every Sunday, wet or dry, for the last ten or fifteen years had gone out and made a collection for the building and maintenance of their schools. A deputation came to him from Liverpool last Friday on this subject. He might mention incidentally that the President of the Board of Education was mistaken as to the views of Catholic authorities on contracting-out. In Liverpool, to a man, the Catholic bishop, priests and laymen were not only in hostility to contracting-out but they were in a state of feverish and almost dangerous excitement at the prospect, and the only reason why he did not advocate to them passive resistance to rates paid by Catholics was the likelihood of passive resistance taking another form. It was his duty, as one of the representatives of that great community in Liverpool, to appease rather than to inflame popular hostility to contracting-out. What would happen under this Bill? The Prime Minister had given it as a strong reason why they should support this Bill that at the present time they were getting 85 per cent. of their expenses. But was that a fair comparison? A fair standard to take was not their position as it existed before but after the passing of the Act of 1902. The children attending Catholic schools were as entitled to every penny of the rates and taxes as the children of other religions attending other schools. The right hon. Gentleman had talked about Catholics being better by 10 per cent. What he should have said was that they were 15 per cent. worse under this Bill than under the Act of 1902. Therefore that entitled him to say that so far as the educational efficiency of their school was concerned this was not progress but retrogression. There had been a great deal said about passive resistance on the other side of the House. This Bill had been brought forward largely for the purpose of meeting the case of the passive resister. He had some sympathy with the passive resister so long as he complained of Anglican doctrine being imparted to Nonconformist children, and on every occasion he and his friends on those benches had done what they could to try to remove the grievance. He had undergone more electoral risks in defending the Nonconformist position on this point than any hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House. Hon. Members opposite could take up the Nonconformist position without antagonising any of their own supporters, but when dealing as he was with extreme Catholics he was constantly being misunderstood. Over and over again Nationalist Members had had to face a perfect cyclone of vituperation and abuse because they stood not only for their own religious convictions, but also for those of the Nonconformists. What was the so-called settlement under this Bill? The money was to be pooled and then left at the disposal of the different denominations. He had spoken of the Catholic priest who went about the Scotland division every Sunday begging for his school. There was no doubt that he was entitled to a large voice in the government of the school, but it was not the Catholic position that he was entitled to the whole voice. They wanted a Catholic school, but they had never claimed that they should be subject to clerical management alone. The Amendment of his hon. friend substituted popular control and this Liberal Democratic Government proposed that they should have clerical control. That was an extraordinary position. They were asked to pay 15 per cent. more for the so-called privilege of being made the pariahs of education in this country. He acknowledged that the Government had been generous and humane to Catholics in certain respects, and he thanked them for it to that extent. When the proposals of the Government were put forward he said to his friends that the inequality and inferiority of the Catholics would not end with education alone. It would run through all the life of the school and shut out from the broad, generous atmosphere of national life; it must be stunted and starved. A friend of his said that that had happened already in Scotland, where a portion of the relief fund which had been wisely allocated for the relief of children in the schools had stopped in the national schools and had not reached the Catholic schools. That was a revival of the spirit of the old penal law. Sweeten it with whatever generosity of sentiment they might express it was a badge of educational inferiority on the children of Catholics because they adhered to their Catholic convictions. It was a strange going back in history when a Liberal and Democratic Government in this age of progress and toleration told the Catholics of the country that they should have education according to their conscientious convictions, but in order to remind them that they were still in a position of religious inferiority as Catholics in a Protestant country they would inflict on them a heavy fine in return for their devotion.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs) said he had the greatest sympathy with the Catholics in the position in which they were placed in regard to their schools. He sincerely hoped that the Government would meet their case by giving them the largest possible grant. It was quite hopeless that they should come on ordinary terms into the national system. Nobody who knew how the Catholic religion was and had to be taught in their schools, could possibly suppose that they could accept the conditions which were accepted in regard to other Churches. With the exception of a few rich people, the Catholics of this country were a poor community, and they had made great sacrifices in providing their own schools. He knew a priest whose income amounted to £20 a month, who spent £17 a month on a school and lived on the remaining £3. While he sympathised with the speech of the hon. Member for Salford he thought it was unnecessary for him to take the opportunity of complaining of an individual Member of the other House, Lord Rothschild, who had been generous, not only to those of his own religion, but to deserving causes of all sorts and should have been exempt from such accusations. The tale repeated was moreover, he believed, a pure invention. The utmost possible help in the way of pecuniary grants should be given to Catholics, with the view of making this settlement acceptable to them.

MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central) in supporting the Amendment said he would ask the Minister for Education to keep an open mind on this matter. Statements had been made as to the cost of contracting-out, which would want careful examination when they came to deal with the figures. He did not pretend that it would be, at any rate at first, £300,000 as had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman. He thought it would be £200,000. But if it was only half of £300,000 it would be an intolerable burden. These were details which must be discussed later. What he wanted to urge was the hopeless position in which these schools would be placed by the working of Clause 3, subsection (3). Clause 3, subsection (3) said—

“All sums paid to an association under this section shall be applied for the purposes of public elementary schools belonging to the association, but subject thereto, the distribution of these sums and the manner in which they are applied shall be in the discretion of the association.”

He contended that those words put the supporters of those schools in an intolerable dilemma. If they carried out improvements on the education from their own point of view they would be ruined financially, and if they refused to carry out these improvements they would be told that they were opposing any advance in education. He, therefore, submitted that if they were to approach this question with any prospect of a settlement, the grants, whatever they might be, must be elastic. He asked the Prime Minister not absolutely to close the door to another solution somewhat on the lines of this Amendment. He confessed there was another reason why he would be very sorry the Amendment was not accepted. Their relations with the local authorities had, with very few exceptions, done an immense amount of good to the Church schools. They had helped the local authorities to realise their position and that had prevented their being cut off from the local authority. He did not believe that the difficulties were insuperable if looked at in a proper light, or that the Amendment would in any way tarnish the formulæ on which the Government relied. Therefore, he hoped that the Prime Minister would not absolutely and finally reject the Amendment which the hon. Member for East Mayo had proposed.

MR. HARWOOD (Bolton) said he had listened with deep interest to the debate and was bound to say a few words on this Amendment because he had felt himself unable to vote for the Second Reading of the Bill. They all desired a solution of this education difficulty, but he thought that they might go too far in trying to secure peace when there was no peace. He represented a large number of Roman Catholic voters, and he had always promised them that he would never support anything which he considered unfair to them. He stood by that promise, and that compelled him to speak a few serious words to the Government and to offer to them a suggestion. The Minister for Education had not only that afternoon but on previous occasions, and also the Prime Minister, given to the Committee the genesis of the Bill. It started from a Nonconformist grievance with which he sympathised. No one could question that grievance; but there had been other grievances as well. It was not the business of the House of Commons to encourage any extravagant conscientious grievances. In his own constituency there were a large number of Roman Catholic schools which had been maintained by the members of that community while they had also been paying the school board rate without a murmur. They had as good ground to rebel as the Nonconformists. Could it be said that the House would listen to those Nonconformists who had rebelled and would not listen to other religious bodies who had to endure as great a wrong but who did not rebel? They all desired a settlement, but not a settlement which would leave at its centre a lasting feeling of a deep wrong. Better wait a little longer than have a settlement which would leave the seeds of a growing discontent. He regretted that the Minister of Education said: “Well, the Roman Catholics will not come into our national system of education. This is the only way they can come in, and therefore they must stay out.” Was that so? He would vote against the plan of the Government, whatever grants they proposed to give to the Roman Catholics. He would vote against any great body of schools being shut out from a national system of education. In his own town the Roman Catholic system worked very well. Possibly he had come under disgrace with some of his constituents because he had declined to vote against the Bill of 1902. In all the Catholic schools in Bolton, under that Bill they had had two representatives on the management of the local authority. There was an enormous advantage in getting representation, even if the local authority did not get full control. Strong Nonconformist friends of his had been on the management of these schools and that had been an advantage to them as well as an enormous advantage to the schools. He, personally, had the greatest possible dislike to one-horse clerically controlled schools—no matter to what denomination they belonged, but he contended that great good had been done by the lay representation on the management of these Catholic schools. Why should the Roman Catholics be made, as they would under this clause, to pay the penalty for a so-called peace, by being thrown back on their previous position, which had been acknowledged to be bad? Was it not possible, if they could not get full authoritative control, to secure representation on the management of these schools by means of some modus vivendi? He knew that the financial position of these schools and the position of the teachers had been vastly improved by the representation of the local authority on the management since the Act of 1902. The teachers were now able to appeal when necessary to the central authority, and their whole position had acquired added dignity and independence. He was sure that the teachers would be loth to go back to their old conditions. This was not altogether a question of money, although the Roman Catholics had shown that they had cheerfully made monetary sacrifices for their schools, and that they would make those sacrifices again. What the Roman Catholics dreaded was being thrown out of the stream of the national educational life of the country and driven into a backwater, so to speak, which would degrade the educational efficiency of their schools and their own self respect. He asked the Government to consider most seriously whether some compromise could not be arrived at instead of pursuing what he believed was a mistaken policy. He had taken part in some conferences for peace for several years past, but he would not cry "Peace, peace," when there was and could be no peace, and while the proposed settlement would leave a spirit of rancour in the hearts of so many of his fellow countrymen. He thought the solution lay in retaining on the management of the voluntary schools, without full control, representation and participation. That would secure both the interest of education, of the public, and of his Nonconformist friends. What would be the result of handing the money grants over to these associations and not to the separate schools? It would be that his Nonconformist friends would say that they were handing it over to be put into clerical pockets. They withdrew all participation, knowledge, and interest in the schools, and they flung them a sum of money, and said: "Divide this among yourselves." He thought it was a backward step, and he would rather have the conditions under the Act of 1902. It was worth considering whether there was no choice between this proposal and retaining those conditions and going on as at present. He would not support or vote for a Bill which carried with it inevitable injustice to a great mass of his fellow-countrymen.

MR. KETTLE (Tyrone, E.) said he had, since he had been in the House, listened to every debate on education in England and Wales with great attention and some amount of wonderment. He had always been anxious to discover what sins the Roman Catholics had committed that they should be penalised under the education system, and he thought he had at last found out what their offence was. The Catholics of this country had committed the unpardonable sin of being a minority. The rejection of this clause, accepted two years ago by the present Government, and now proposed by his hon. friend the Member for East Mayo, meant that they might have many things in England, but there was one thing they were determined not to have, and that was religious equality. With every claim for religious equality came the cry of "Rome on the rates," or something equivalent, but when rates, portions of which were contributed by Roman Catholics, went to the upkeep of schools for other than Roman Catholic children the fundamental question arose of whether it was "Rome on the rates" or "Rates on Rome." Surely the honour and dignity of this great Protestant country, which was engaged in a great Protestant settlement, would require that if Rome was not to be helped from the rates its Roman Catholic subjects should be relieved from the local rates for its educational system. If they were to have principles, and the House did discover them occasionally from time to time, they really ought to have principles which would work both ways. His hon. friend the Member for East Mayo put the whole situation in a phrase which, if there was impartial journalism in this country, would ring throughout it with greater prominence than "Rome on the rates." The hon. Member said—

"Catholics are to be fined for conscience sake."

They repudiated most strongly the opinion that it was a privilege to stand out of the national system. The hon. Member for Preston at an earlier period of the afternoon took exception to that phrase of standing out of the national system, and made some qualification which perhaps cleared up things; but at all events the Catholic subjects of this country, as the result of conscientious conviction, with the strength of which every Member of the House was perfectly well acquainted, were compelled to stand out of the normal national system, to be an excrescence upon it, and to send their children to schools which from mere financial necessity must be, whatever the self-sacrifice of the teacher, if not inferior in fact, generally regarded as inferior to the general voluntary schools of the country. That was the situation. He did not think the speech of the Minister for Education, in refusing to accept this Amendment, was very happily phrased, although he did not go so far as to accuse him of discourtesy, at any rate of deliberate discourtesy. He must congratulate him upon his new found respect for the House of Lords, based on the vote of a small section of Catholic Peers. He was sure hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite did not regard the House of Lords in all its decisions upon all Bills as acting under plenary and divine inspiration, and at any rate it was a small body of Peers who voted. He did not attach much importance to the decisions of the House of Lords, but the question was as to the general position in regard to the appointment of teachers, and the vote was taken on a clause which was radically different from this one. The Minister for Education said the Catholics possessed a large amount of patronage in their schools, and spoke of their having a preserve exclusively kept for Catholic teachers. He thought he told them that there were something like 5,000 teacherships filled by Catholics under the present system. Might he suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that if the education of this country were conducted on fair and equal conditions the Catholics would not have less than 5,000 teacherships. If there were no tests would the Roman Catholics fill fewer teacherships paid for by public money than the number mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman. His own impression was that they would fill a very much larger number. The Minister for Education gave his real reason for his opposition to the clause in the latter part of his speech. He did not confine his opposition to it to any ground of principle or administrative difficulty, but said that the Nonconformist opinion in the country was such as to make it impossible for him to grant the demand involved in the acceptance of the Amendment. If that was so, this part of the Bill dealing with Catholics, this being the final compromise and offer, was to be settled, not by Catholic, but by Nonconformist opinion. They emancipated the Nonconformists in 1829, although they had forgotten the fact. They fought the old religious battles against the Established Church, both in England and in Ireland, side by side with the Nonconformists, and he was bound to say, although, like his hon. friend, he remembered with profound gratitude their action in connection with the Irish University Bill earlier in the session, when he looked at their action on this matter he felt he was almost sorry that they ever emancipated them and gave them seats in this House. Although the Nonconformists always said they sympathised with their point of view, he was extremely sceptical whether they understood it. He was profoundly convinced and persuaded of the sincerity and tenacity with which they held their own principles, but they seemed unable to adjust themselves to their point of view. He would say no more. He did not share their religious prejudices, but he respected them, and he was sorry they could not see their way to support the political principle of equality for which they had historically stood in this country. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to a statement of his hon. friend the Member for South Kerry, on the Scottish Education Bill, to the effect that Catholics in Scotland would be content with an increase of 10s. per head on the 40s. provided by that Bill. The right hon. Gentleman then went on to institute a comparison between the cost of education in Scotland and England, leading to the conclusion that if in Scotland the Catholics would be content with 50s. they ought to be content with the same figure in England. His hon. friend said nothing of the kind; he never said that a grant of 50s. would place these schools on an equality with the State schools in Scotland. The question of principle undoubtedly did come into this matter, but that of money and pecuniary consideration also came in. The President of the Board of Education was not, as he understood it, as completely persuaded of the equity and justice of the settlement as he was before the discussion began. He had the figures before him from the Catholic authorities stating the Catholic point of view, and pointing out the deductions which must be made from the supposed advantage which came in under the pooling arrangement. He took the right hon. Gentleman's statement that afternoon as not expressing the same measure of belief with regard to the Schedule, and as indicating that the Government were prepared to listen to reason and mathematics, if it was not prepared to listen to conscience with regard to the Bill. His hon. friend for the Scotland Division had referred to the passive resistance of their Nonconformist friends, and suggested that if this Bill passed in its present form without facilities for the Catholics of this country, they possibly might take a hint from the action of their Nonconformist friends in the past. From the Catholics of Lancashire, who were largely Irish, he himself would expect a policy of active, and not passive resistance. His short experience in the House had taught him that minorities, whether Catholic or other, got a good deal of sympathy, but no justice. If the Bill was passed in its present form without this consideration for the Catholic conscience, which ought to be respected even in a Protestant country, the Government would carry through their great final settlement with a wrong and injustice, which they had not sought to defend, embedded in its heart. They were stamping the Catholic schools with a sort of broad arrow, and making them the outcasts and pariahs of the national system of education. They did not want to stand outside the system of national educational life, but the Government compelled them to. They side-tracked them and turned them into a back-water. In addition to that, they inflicted upon them a heavy penalty. He could not think that such conditions could form the basis of a real and permanent settlement of this controversy.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.) said he could not allow the debate to close without giving expression to the intense indignation which he knew would be roused among the Irish and Catholic population of this country, by the action of the Government. They all thought towards the end of the debates on the Bill of 1906 that something like a satisfactory solution had been arrived at and everyone regretted that that solution had been upset by the House of Lords. The arrangement arrived at at the last moment between Lord Crewe and the Catholic Members of this House was embodied in the last paragraph of the new clause on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for East Mayo. It was never discussed or voted on either in the House of Lords or this House, the possibility of that discussion being destroyed by the action of Lord Lansdowne and his friends. They had been told by the right hon. Gentleman that he now could not get the consent of the Nonconformist Party to the provisions of Clause 4 of the Bill of 1906, but he himself did not believe there had been so great a change in the opinion of the Nonconformists since two years ago, that they would refuse a way to an all round settlement, because they refused to accept the arrangement made between Lord Crewe and the Catholics of this House. He was not one of those who took it for granted that the sole enemies to Catholic education were the Nonconformists. He had no sympathy with the strong language used against the Nonconformists, because he believed that if the Government gave them a chance they would adhere to the arrangement made when the Bill of 1906 was introduced. If that were the fact, he believed the Catholic community would accept as a settlement Clause 4 of that Bill. He could not, however, forget the action of a certain section of the Church of England, which had been, if he might say so without offence, to the last degree mean and treacherous towards the Catholic community of this country. They had used the influence and votes of the Catholic representatives for the purpose of defending the interests of the Anglican schools, and made common cause with the Catholics for that purpose. When the opportunity came and they made terms for themselves, they threw off all association with the Catholics, and deserted the interests of the Catholic schools. Therefore, if there was to be any condemnation, that section of the Church of England deserved its share. It seemed a tremendous pity when there was in the air and in the breasts of all men a general desire for a permanent settlement of this question, that such an arrangement as that contained in the clause of the hon. Member for East Mayor could not be arrived at. They were told that if this Bill was passed into law it would effect a permanent settlement. It was quite true that certain hon. Members above the gangway voted for the Government on the Second Reading, but so far as other portions of the House were concerned there was nothing like a strong and unanimous opinion in favour of this Bill. The division showed the very reverse. Was anyone prepared to get up and say that no matter what the division might be on the Third Reading this would be anything like a settlement in face of the action of the Leader of the Opposition? Nobody could attempt to say that there would be educational satisfaction or settlement in this country when so many, both in and outside this House, were opposed to the Bill. They had strongly and bitterly opposed to the Bill the late Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, with a large following, and they had the opposition of the Catholics in that House and throughout the length and breadth of the land. With such an array of political forces could anyone believe that the Bill would leave the question of education in a satisfactory position, or that there would be anything but a renewal of hostilities, discontent, and dissatisfaction? He said, as a Catholic Member of that House, and he thought that it was the opinion of every other Catholic Member, that such a result was a pity. He believed that it was perfectly possible to arrive at a settlement which would be really permanent, final, and satisfactory to all interests and denominations if the Government only took a little time. They had been sitting pretty nearly the whole year through, and within a few days the House must adjourn for Christmas, yet this matter of grave importance, the most important matter that Parliament could deal with, was to be disposed of within a short period. Where was the necessity for this extraordinary hurry? Why should a pistol be put to the head, not only of one party, but of all the parties in the House? Why should the Government say that in two weeks before Christmas Day the question must be settled? There was no reason for this undue haste. He thought that the Government would be far better advised if they sought, not after a hasty settlement, but a real, permanent, general, and satisfactory settlement. He believed that such an all-round and general satisfactory settlement could be arrived at if men were given time; but if the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Minister for Education, like a couple of religious highwaymen, put pistols to their heads and said: "You have got to take what we propose," then he thought that was unreasonable. It was said by some people that Catholics really had a great deal of assurance in asking for any assistance from the Government at all. They were told that in other English speaking countries the Catholic people were not offered any assistance whatever for their schools. But what they did in other countries, he presumed, had nothing whatever to do with educational questions in this country, which was upheld to other countries as an example of broad-mindedness and as a place where, whatever might be the case in other countries, there was freedom of conscience and religious equality for all. That was the attitude taken up by this country. She had no right to refer to America or any of the Colonies, or to any other part of the world, because if she did not want to be regarded as a hypocrite England must act up to her professions and give to all the subjects of the realm and to every religion equal and fair treatment. The Catholics, he was certain, asked for no more. Dr. Clifford constantly quoted the phrase "Rome on the rates," but that phrase was too much like the refrain of some song in a low music hall, and it was an absurd statement if they considered the Church of Rome in connection with her rights. Catholics were entitled in common fairness to justice. He would say to hon. Members whose opinion they generally respected that if Catholics were compelled to pay rates for educational purposes, they were entitled to get some return for those rates. He could understand perfectly well if hon. Gentlemen opposite said: "We regret that Roman Catholics cannot come into the educational system because of conscientious objections, and that therefore they do not get any advantage from the rates which they pay. It is not fair to exact money from people and give them no return for it. We will relieve the Catholic parents of the country from the payment of rates for educational purposes." If that were proposed it would be fair and reasonable. He would like to hear some reason why such a proposal should not be made. And what became of the rates of the Catholics? He was happy to say that they had members of various denominations in the Nationalist Party representing Ireland, and the question of religion was never raised among them. Speaking as a Catholic Member of the House, whose father was a Catholic Member before him, he would say that he had an equal respect for members of all the Protestant denominations. He had as much respect for the opinion of Nonconformist Members as he had for the opinion of Church of England representatives in the House or outside it. He had no feeling of prejudice one way or the other in regard to any of them.

He differed from them all inasmuch as they, whatever their particular sect might be, belonged to the one great Protestant religion, with which as a Catholic he could not agree. But it was a monstrous thing to come to the Catholic parents of the country, who were among the poorest and hardest worked citizens in the land, and say to them: "We have made an arrangement by which your consciences will not allow you to send your children to our schools. We respect your opinions; we do not find fault with them; we regret the necessity which compels us to keep you outside; but notwithstanding that necessity you shall pay towards the upkeep of our schools." Why should they say to Catholics that they were not only to be excluded from the schools but that they were to pay rates for the maintenance of schools which they did not use? They would use the money of Catholics for a religion which was entirely foreign to the hearts of Catholics, and was to be taught in the public schools. That in his opinion was a monstrously unfair position. He had no intention of saying anything in the slightest degree disrespectful or offensive to Nonconformists, because he agreed with the hon. Member for Liverpool that Nonconformists had had to suffer in the past just as Catholics had had to suffer in many parts of their history for conscience sake; still, in his opinion, it was a mean thing to take the pence and shillings and pounds of a few hard-worked Catholic workmen and say that the money should be used directly for the teaching of a religion of which these men did not approve. They were to have Cowper-Templeism, on which he was not an authority; he believed that it differed in various localities according to the wishes of the authorities. [AN HON. MEMBER: It is an elastic religion.] He thanked the hon. Gentleman for giving him a true description of Cowper-Templeism; it was now an elastic religion. He did not quarrel with the hon. Member for that. Supporters of that religion admired it probably because of its elasticity. At any rate, whatever might be said of the Catholic religion, it could not be described as elastic. Yet Catholics were to be called upon to pay for a religion which was elastic and repugnant to them. That was something which should be regarded as quite unfair. If hon. Gentlemen opposite admired Cowper-Templeism he did not quarrel with their opinion, but surely they could pay for it. He did not suppose that there was a Catholic who would make it a condition in the educational settlement that a farthing of Nonconformist money or of Church of England money should be spent on teaching the Catholic catechism to a single Catholic child in this land. Whatever their difficulties and troubles might be, Catholics could at least pay for the religion of their children, and they were proud to do so. He submitted that in all fairness the position was untenable, and that it was a mean thing to call upon the Catholics of this country to pay rates for schools which they did not use, and in addition to give them no guarantee whatever that their money would not be used for the propagation of religion in which they did not believe in the faintest degree. He believed that it would be perfectly easy to come to an arrangement on the lines of Clause 4 of the Bill of 1906. He believed that clause would be acceptable not only to the Catholics but to those members of the Church of England who were not accepting the present settlement proposals of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Minister for Education. It was an unfair and a disastrous thing that Catholic or Church of England schools should be separated in the general settlement; they ought to be brought together. He believed that it was quite within the powers of statesmanship to bring all the children of the schools of all denominations into a common scheme, at the same time providing fair and reasonable safeguards for the religious convictions and principles of every denomination in the land. This Bill would not do that; it would bring about no permanent settlement. It might pass; but as sure as it did pass, everybody knew that not many years would elapse before another Government would propose to amend it. There had been tinkering enough with the education question. Other countries in the world were ahead of us. Germany was far ahead of us. And why? Largely because in Germany they had long ago seen the harm of not doing the very thing which he was urging upon the Government to do now. In Germany they had recognised the strength of the claims of the various denominations. They gave Catholic and Protestant equality of treatment, and the result was educational efficiency. It was possible to do that in this country, if there was only time. Let them have some real reason why all this amount of work should be done within a fortnight. What was there magical in the year 1908? There were only a few weeks of it left. Surely next year when men had had time to think, when other people, with all respect to the Archbishop of Canterbury, had had conferences, when the Leader of the Opposition and his party and other sections of the community had had an opportunity, which he supposed they had not yet had, of considering the whole question, would not that be time enough to bring in this Bill? No. Let the truth at once be told about this matter. The Government were resolved to carry this Bill by the guillotine, by stifling discussion, within the compass of three or four days, practically before Christmas, because they knew that every day that passed by showed fresh recruits flocking to that already not inconsiderable army which could not possibly accept the present proposals of the Government. If this Bill were postponed until next year it would be found on further consideration that when the Leader of the Opposition rose to speak he would speak for the majority of the Members sitting behind him, and that the number of Nonconformists who were opposed to this settlement would have increased. The Government knew this and felt that if the matter was to be carried through at all it must be carried through at once before men had had time to think and to investigate the matter. Was there a matter in England upon which the constituencies felt more strongly, and in which they took a deeper interest than this school question? Was it an unreasonable thing considering that it had been sprung on the country suddenly without any warning—

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN (Mr. CAIDWELL, Lanarkshire, Mid.): Those remarks apply to the discussion that took place on Friday on the Resolution allocating the time of the House. They do not apply to this Amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND said he wished only to ask, if the Amendment could not be accepted, whether the Government would not agree to postpone the whole matter so that Members of all parties would have an opportunity for a week or so at least of consulting their constituents and holding meetings and of really getting at the true pulse of the country. He supposed it was idle to expect that the Government would accept the Amendment. It would probably be defeated by a very large majority. He deeply regretted it. He was absolutely certain that the Government was throwing away a great opportunity, an opportunity which nearly arrived in 1906 and which was bound to come with patience and with a certain amount of consideration and time, an opportunity of bringing about a settlement which would satisfy every denomination. He did not believe this settlement would really satisfy anything like a majority of any denomination.

*Mr. STUART (Sunderland) said he was one of those who regretted that the Bill of 1906 did not pass, and more particularly because the clause which was reproduced in this Amendment, in his opinion, met adequately the situation of the Catholic Members. Whether it was possible to revert to that or not he could not say. It must depend upon the Government. He presumed it was no part of the arrangement which they had made with the Church of England. He did not wish to see the Bill postponed or thrown aside, because he believed moderate representatives of both sides of opinion had come so near to a conclusion that it was well that they should proceed. But under these circumstances the Catholic community was being left out in the cold. It could not be included in any solution such as this Bill appeared to offer in its present form. It had very peculiar claims to consideration. The Non-conformists and the Church of England were both Protestant. They were at one in their belief in the open Bible both as a means of education and as a religious advantage. But the Roman Catholics differed from them toto cœlo. They upheld that it was unsuitable for education, that it was unsuitable for the laity. However much they might differ from that point of view that was their point of view, and they held it conscientiously. When the Protestant communities got rid for some time of this educational quarrel by an agreement among themselves, surely it would be a great mistake if these two great parties in the State did not take into account the position of their Roman Catholic friends and endeavour to invent something which should meet their difficulties too. If they were going to have a solution between the two parties he did not at all side with those who thought that such a solution would break down easily. The moderate people on both sides were tired of this constant educational quarrel. Extreme people would never come into any agreement, but they would have to accept it when it was made. He believed they had a solid mass of the people willing to combine with the moderate people on both sides. When they were going to get a solution of the question which affected themselves and their point of view, let them not be so selfish as to leave their Roman Catholic friends out in the cold. They would do well to turn their minds to what they could do to meet the Roman Catholic difficulty. There was no doubt that the Amendment would meet that difficulty, if it were applied to the Roman Catholics alone. They ought on both sides of the House to be willing to have something of the kind done to meet them, though it was on a different line from what met the difficulty they were trying their mutual concessions. doubt that would settle the far as they were concerned Government could not give solution let them turn to form of solution, and there forms. There was the simple solution. Let them give something which would meet difficulties, because they were community in England and was the richest. If they avoid everything of the religious persecution, if they to have toleration as it but was too seldom understood, they ought to recollect that the Catholics were separated from them by a definite gulf. They did not all like Cowper-Temple teaching or Church of England teaching, but they were on the opposite side of the division line from that on which the Roman Catholics stood. He pressed upon the Government that they would injure the settlement if they left the Catholics out of it. There was still an opportunity to devise something. He did not believe it was wise to adhere to the Bill and the Government ought to be in a position before they came to the Report stage, if they could not support the Amendment, to deal with the question in some way so that they might not make an agreement between themselves and leave the poorest part of the population outside it.

*MR. F. E. SMITH said the hon. Member for East Clare, speaking of the conduct of the Archbishop and some of his hon. friends, said that in his judgment the Church of England was guilty of mean and treacherous conduct in making a settlement for itself without regard to the equal claims of the Roman Catholics. He should himself, having repeatedly in the course of three successive Education Bills, though not a strong denominationalist, advocated the claim for equal treatment amongst all denominations, think he was guilty of mean and treacherous conduct if, because the Archbishop of Canterbury was, rightly or wrongly, of the impression that he had made a settlement which as far as the Church of England was concerned was satisfactory, they were to eliminate from that settlement Roman Catholics, whose case was precisely similar to that of Churchmen. The last speaker had made the curious observation that the Catholics, as far as this grievance was concerned, stood in a position alone, and he certainly suggested that no similar grievance was felt by members of the Church of England. Such an argument seriously put forward after three sessions of stormy Parliamentary debate simply filled one with despair. He held on this question a brief no more for the Church than for the Catholic faith, but the one thing that had struck everyone in the whole course of the debate had been that the denominational position, if it had ever rested on strong ground at all, had rested on this ground, that no man, no matter of what faith, had a right to impose by force upon a third party his own will and his own view of what another man ought to believe. That was the whole case. Practically it was equivalent to a man saying he believed a certain thing and others ought to. The only comment one could make upon that point was that if the Catholic position was right the Anglican position was also right; the Catholic position was right, not because of its disparity in relation to Cowper-Temple teaching, but on the broad ground that the adult citizens of a free country had a right to form their own opinion in religious matters. Approaching the question from this point of view he had been struck by some observations from the hon. Member for East Mayo, who, in a moderate and well-reasoned speech, expressed the opinion of Roman Catholics on the subject. A very considerable amount of abuse had been directed against the House of Lords for their attitude in regard to the last Education Bill, but nevertheless hon. Members to-day had been quite ready to express their satisfaction with Clause 4 of the Bill of 1906 as it left the House of Lords. Hon. Members below the gangway were so far contented with that clause that they were quite ready to introduce now into this Bill in the form of an Amendment.

MR. DILLON said that Clause 4 had a very tangled history. The clause he had introduced was not quite the same. The House of Lords made certain alterations which did not satisfy the representatives of Catholics. Consequently the Ministry made further alterations in response to their request which made the clause satisfactory after it had left the Lords.

*MR. F. E. SMITH replied that it was a long clause, and he thought he was right in saying that when the clause referred to left the House of Commons the Leader of the Irish Party referred to it as an insult. Lord Crevier also in another place distinctly stated that Clause 4 in its altered shape would save have been accepted by the Government unless it was forced upon them by the House of Lords. Therefore, this concession was made in consequence of Amendments introduced in the House of Lords and accepted by the Government in the course of the pressure brought to bear in another place. No one could fail to respect both the tact and the patience which the Minister for Education had brought to bear on educational problems, and this was a refreshing contrast to his predecessor in office. He had, however, been struck with the argument of the right hon. Gentleman in which he stated that if he had attempted to apply Clause 4 to the present Bill he could not have carried the Nonconformists in the country with him. Where did that declaration land them? At the time of the passing of the Bill of 1906 did they not carry the Nonconformists with them? It was claimed at that time that the clause did carry the Nonconformists of the country with the Government, and now in a Bill which represented a compromise and was giving better terms, they were told that they could not have the same clause because it would not carry the Nonconformists with the Government. This question must be determined on grounds of principle. The question was whether it was right or wrong, and not whether the Government could carry the Nonconformists with them. The right hon. Gentleman would act wisely to remember that many powerful Ministers in great controversies had thought it convenient to inquire whether they could carry the Roman Catholics with them. If it was to resolve itself merely into a process of counting heads in the country he was not at all certain that the arithmetic of the Government was very reliable. Was the right hon. Gentleman sure he was right in saying he could not carry the Nonconformists with him? He premised his observations by saying he was not at all sure that the Government were carrying the Nonconformists with them in large numbers on the lines of the proposed settlement.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The hon. Gentleman need be under no apprehension on that point. I would not have acted without Nonconformist support.

*MR. F. E. SMITH said he was not attempting to attenuate the concession which the Nonconformists had made, but, so far as the country was concerned, as distinguished from Nonconformists in the House of Commons, he was not sure that the right hon. Gentleman was not too sanguine. The Nonconformist grievance was embodied in the formulæ "Not one penny of public money without public control," and "No clerical interference with the schools." But here they were giving £600,000 a year to a few clerics, and it made not the least difference whether the money was paid out of rates or taxes. This money was going to be spent without the fullest control; as a matter of fact they handed over £600,000 to a few priests controlled by an Archbishop, without any pretence whatever that any control was going to be exercised. That was how the Nonconformist grievance was going to be removed. He approached this question with a genuine desire that there should be a settlement. With regard to passive resisters, what was the only logical ground upon which passive resistance was based? It was a ground which had much in it, and one that appealed to every person who felt pain when he saw people undergoing imprisonment and suffering for conscience sake. The grievance was that a man was forced to pay a rate for the teaching of a religion which he regarded as pernicious. In that sense in the single-school areas there was a real grievance felt by Nonconformists who paid the education rate, but that grievance was nothing like so real as that which was endured by the Roman Catholics. The substantiality of the grievance complained of by the Nonconformists was nothing when contrasted with the grievance of the Roman Catholics. It was either right or wrong to make a man pay a rate to teach a religion in which he did not believe. They had been told that it was a cruel and intolerable wrong, and therefore, he asked those who held that opinion to apply it to the position of the Roman Catholics. Why was it not a cruel wrong to Catholics when it was admitted that their faith was removed from Cowper-Temple teaching by a gulf infinitely greater than that which separated Cowper-Temple believers from the doctrines of the Church of England? Catholics were made to pay the education rate out of their scanty pence. If it was a grievance in the case of Nonconformists which justified them in setting themselves up in organised revolt against laws passed by Parliament; if it was really a grievance which justified passive resistance, what answer was going to be made now by Nonconformists in this House to Roman Catholics when they said: "Here is a rate which presses on our conscience which you are making us pay for the support of schools established for the propagation of doctrines which we believe to be blasphemous, and will imperil the eternal salvation of our children." It was idle that a compromise based upon those lines could or ought to be permanent. The Roman Catholics would be unworthy of being free citizens of a free country if they consented to a compromise which was nothing but a brutal dictation of terms.

MR. HART-DAVIES (Hackney, N.) thought the question before the Committee was merely a matter of common sense. We had a national system of education, and the Catholics and other denominations said they could not come into it. [Cries of "No."] Under these circumstances he could see no hardship in saying to them: "If you must stand out of the national system, be it so, but you cannot expect to have the whole of the expenses of your schools paid for by national funds." [Cries of "Why?"] He admitted that the weakness of the position was that there was a certain form of religious teaching in all schools, but he thought it was reasonable to say: "We will pay for all secular education in your schools and leave you to pay for religious instruction." He had always been in favour of a secular system. He was education inspector for a good many years in India. The Government schools in that country were purely secular, but there were schools which wanted a denominational atmosphere, and to them a grant was given which was supposed to represent the full cost of secular education only. He did not find that those schools suffered from being cut off from the main stream of national education, and he could not see why schools that contracted out under this Bill should suffer. He would be in favour of an extremely liberal grant increasing according to the amount spent on the school. They ought to be encouraged to make their schools efficient. He could not see why these schools should suffer in the smallest degree; they would be open to the advantages which other schools enjoyed in the way of scholarships. They would have their own management and their own masters and he did not see why the schools should be looked upon as inferior. He was in favour of contracting out. He did not want the whole of the youth of England to be brought up on the school board pattern. He did not want them to be fed altogether on Cowper-Templeism. He respected the Irish Catholics for their attachment to their schools, and if they were fairly treated in the matter of grants, they would be put on a proper footing.

*MR. GWYNN (Galway) said the discussion had gone on for several hours and he had listened to the whole of it. Not a single Member had risen to reply to the arguments of the hon. Member for East Mayo. The hon. Member who had just spoken was the first speaker to defend the proposals of the Government, but it was a singular defence. The hon. Member did not defend the scheme whole-heartedly, because he was in favour of secular education. Moreover, he admitted that the Protestant religion in some form or other was now to be taught in all schools, and, therefore, Catholics could not be on a basis of religious equality. While the hon. Member was in favour of contracting out he postulated an expanding grant to cover the whole cost of education other than religious education; but the grant proposed was strictly limited and notoriously inadequate. That was the first time that he had taken part in an English education debate, and he hoped it would be the last, for this was a discussion in which the very name of logic was out of place. The right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill admitted that it was bad logic, and commended it to the House on that ground. That was the extraordinary advantage of English Ministers, possessed by them more than anybody else in the world. If a scheme was logical they defended it on account of its logic; if it was not logical they said that it was in harmony with the British nature and the British Constitution. In this case bad logic was not a very good foundation on which to rest the Bill. They were now dealing with proposals which were the result of an arrangement entered into behind the backs of the House. It was an arrangement of which English Members on both sides of the House might complain. But in the negotiations which had taken place those for whom he spoke had no representation at all. When he came to examine the reply of the Minister for Education to his hon. friend the Member for East Mayo what did he find? The right hon. Gentleman did not object on principle to the argument of his hon. friend, but said that the fact was that the Nonconformists of this country were against it. What he expressed was not argument but a conviction, and a conviction for which no reasonable argument could apparently be alleged. Such a conviction was in truth only a prejudice. When the right hon. Gentleman told them that he could not carry the Nonconformists of England in this matter, he wished to know whether Nonconformist opinion had really been sounded. Was it possible that it was determined to deny in 1908 what it was prepared to concede in 1906? Had the right appeal been made to the Nonconformists in that House? Already this session the Chief Secretary had appealed to them not without success, and he now appealed from their Nonconformist prejudices to their Liberal principles. The whole contention of his hon. friend was based on Liberal principles. It was the desire of Catholics to be part and parcel of the democratic system, but the desire of the Government was to hand them over to the most extraordinary piece of clerical machinery ever propounded by a Liberal Government. Had the Nonconformists been approached and reasoned with in this matter? From the point of view of higher statesmanship was it desirable to introduce into the body politic such a division as would be introduced by these two types of schools? Was that the way that Liberals were going to bring about the union of hearts between Irish and English? He urged the right hon. Gentleman to take a lesson from the success achieved in another matter this session by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and to try to induce the Nonconformists to approach this measure in the spirit of Liberalism and not in the spirit of eighteenth century theology.

*MR. BUTCHER (Cambridge University) said he confessed that he had listened with some disappointment to the speech of the Minister for Education which seemed to him hard, dry, and unsympathetic. The right hon. Gentleman never appeared fully to appreciate the position of the Roman Catholics, which had been set forth with such clearness that evening. But this was not merely, in his judgment, a Roman Catholic question. The Amendment was the only solution of a great difficulty with which they were confronted. He believed that this amended version of Clause 4 of the Bill of 1906 was the right treatment to apply to all the homogeneous schools, both Church of England and Roman Catholic, that needed exceptional treatment. Although many more in proportion of the Roman Catholic schools would benefit by it than the Church of England schools, he believed the Church of England would not grudge that benefit going to the members of the other Church. The case for such treatment was strong for Church of England schools in other than single school areas, but it was infinitely stronger for the Roman Catholic schools. First, because the Roman Catholics had no compensatory advantages to set off against their loss, while the Church of England gained at least the right of entry into the council schools. The Nonconformists also had many compensations, which had been frequently enumerated. But the Roman Catholic schools had not a single gain. In the second place, there was this further point about the Roman Catholic case as compared with the case for the Church of England. The Church of England had under the Bill an alternative course; they might elect either to contract out under the terms offered by the Bill, or to become council schools under popular control. But the Roman Catholics had no alternative. Contracting out was the one thing offered to them.

The council school was closed to them by the barrier of conscience. Therefore, if the Roman Catholics were given this as the one solution of the question, he held that the Government ought to make the contracting out a reality, and offer it on the most generous terms. The Minister for Education spoke of the grossly exaggerated language which had been used, as to the sums which would need to be paid by the Roman Catholics for the maintenance of their schools. As an instance of this he quoted a statement that in London the amount per head payable was £5 18s. He said truly that in this sum were included a large number of other charges. But let them take the figures of the White Paper. There was a very large difference between a 50s. grant and the sum of 94s. which was given in the White Paper as the cost of maintenance per head in London.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The figures given in the White Paper include a number of charges that cannot fall upon the contracted-out schools.

MR. RUNCIMAN: No.

*MR. BUTCHER said that if the right hon. Gentleman did not know it, he could not be supposed to know it to a shilling or two, but he felt no doubt that the White Paper gave, except for some trifling deductions, the charge for maintenance. They must also bear in mind the progressive rise in cost which had been going on since 1902. Figures supplied to him of a great many voluntary Church schools in London showed that the rise had been as much as 50 per cent. for salaries and equipment. That rise was still going on, and he thought nobody could say that even the sum of 94s. was likely to be under the mark in the next few years. They had been told that fees might be charged, in order to make up the difference, but from all he could learn there were very few Church of England schools which could afford now to ask fees, and the Roman Catholic schools were the very poorest in the country. Indeed, he supposed that if it were not that the Roman Catholics were able to get the services of the religious orders at very much lower wages than the market rate, they could not get teachers at all. The right hon. Gentleman used the argument that in Scotland they found 40s. per head was sufficient for Roman Catholic schools and why should not 50s. be sufficient in England? Well, 40s. per head in Scotland might have kept the schools going, but it should be remembered that in England since 1902 there had been a higher standard of efficiency and equipment all round, and it was impossible to ask schools which had been raised to a higher level to fall back to a lower. The Minister for Education in the correspondence with the Archbishop said that the contracted-out schools were to have a reasonable chance of existence. They ought to have more than that; they ought to have a reasonable chance of efficiency. Why did the Government refuse this solution, which educationally was far better than the contracting-out solution for schools of the homogeneous type that they were considering? He could not help thinking that the reason that they denied it to Roman Catholics was that they feared lest they should admit a certain number of Church of England schools. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh."] If it was that, it was a most unworthy reason. This contracting-out solution was not, he hoped, the last word of the Government. He came down there with hopes, as one who ardently desired, not through sheer weariness but for other reasons, to come to a settlement of this question. He came with hopes of a compromise being reached which would be a little elastic and that the Government would be prepared to make concessions. After all, contracting-out on the terms now offered was of such a kind that under it religious conviction carried with it civic disabilities. It struck at the parent through the secular welfare of his child. It was a cruel alternative to offer to the Church of England, a cruel necessity to impose upon Roman Catholics. Looking generally at Continental Europe, at the Colonies, and elsewhere abroad, they found that the only countries which had arrived at a peaceful and final settlement of the educational controversy had done so by recognising the great diversity that existed of thought and creed and conviction, and in this country, too, he was confident that the only way to peace would be by the road of toleration.

*MR. NAPIER (Kent, Faversham) did not think that the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for East Mayo, although it was the last form in which Clause 4 was before the Houses of Parliament, was a perfect form. The Amendment was somewhat complicated and depended upon a number of contingencies. It was likely to give rise to a great deal of friction, but still, with all its defects, he preferred it considerably to contracting-out. The real thing which he thought the House wanted to arrive at, and the real thing which the Government would like to arrive at, was some form of clause under which the whole of the future expenditure on educational efficiency should not fall upon the denomination itself, and in the case of the Roman Catholics he thought it was peculiarly necessary that some form of clause should be adopted under which this should not be the case. It had been pointed out by speaker after speaker representing the Roman Catholics that they formed the poorest part of the population of the country, and he was sure they would not think he meant anything offensive when he said that they also formed the most ignorant part of the population. That almost necessarily followed from the fact of their poverty, and if that was so, what a pity it was from the point of view of national efficiency that they should condemn them to a punishment of this kind, under which it would be almost impossible for them from time to time to provide the necessary funds to keep their schools on a level with the schools which had the rates behind them. Might he ask whether this was an essential part of the compromise? If the President of the Board or the Prime Minister assured them that if the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Mayo was carried there would be an end of the compromise, he should feel bound with infinite regret to vote for the Government, because he felt the chief matter was that as between the two great parties to this educational difficulty they should obtain a settlement, but he should be also regretful that the position in which the Roman Catholic and many English schools would be left would not be a convenient one. He did not gather that this question of contracting-out was an essential part of the agreement as regarded the Church of England. Had the Archbishop said: "I insist upon this clause"? The President of the Board of Education did not tell them so as a matter of fact, and he challenged the right hon. Gentleman to say that this question was a term advanced by the Church of England. The Church of England had certain schools which she would desire to have the benefits of the Amendment which the hon. Member claimed for Roman Catholics—homogeneous schools mostly of a high Church or Anglican character. Hon. Members would remember that institutions of this kind were not only permissible in the Church of England but had existed in that Church from the very earliest times, and while the Church as a whole was a Protestant institution, the Catholic part of the Church of England had from the reign of James I. down to the present time been an integral portion of that Church. Therefore, they had the right to claim for the Anglican school of the Church of England the same privileges which Roman Catholics were claiming for themselves. He ventured to say that there was no stipulation on behalf of the Church of England that the contracting-out in Clause 4 should be a portion of the Bill. What about the Nonconformists? The President told them that the view of the Nonconformists was strongly in favour of contracting-out as against Clause 4, but if he was rightly informed he did not think there was anything like a unanimous, perhaps even a preponderating opinion, of Nonconformists in favour of contracting-out as against Clause 4. Perhaps the President was moved by a recollection of what happened during the Bill of 1906. They knew then that Clause 4 gave many searchings of heart to many Nonconformists in the House and in the country, and that they did not like the clause. But a great deal of water had flowed down the Thames since 1906, and both sides of this House had begun to understand the position which was taken up by the other, and the religious denominations of the country were to-day infinitely more sympathetic with each other than they were then. He believed hon. Members on that side of the House more fully understood and sympathised with the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite than they did in 1906, and it seemed to him that after the expressions of opinion they had had that day, there might be a greater understanding which might possibly lead to a more satisfactory compromise. Might he point out one thing, and he addressed himself mainly to his hon. friends on that side of the House. He ventured to say that approaching the matter on Nonconformist principles he thought they ought to prefer some variation of Clause 4 to contracting-out. There were three principles with which the House was well acquainted, which were the great issues of the Education Bill of 1906, viz., public control, no tests for teachers, and no application of public money to denominational purposes. Applying those three tests to the alternative schemes of contracting-out on the one hand and Clause 4 on the other, they had no public control in contracted-out schools, but they had in Clause 4 schools. They necessarily had tests for teachers in both sets of schools and as to the application of public money in each case there was no direct application of public money to denominational teaching, and there was quite as little application in the one case as in the other. If they looked at and took the whole Nonconformist position which was before the country at the last general election he ventured to say that that position was more offended by the contracting-out clause than by Clause 4. He would say just one word upon a point made by the President in regard to the Roman Catholic Church and what it had to say about public control. That was based upon the declaration of Archbishop Vaughan, as the President himself told them, in 1905, before the general election. Well, even more water had flowed down the Thames since 1905 than since 1906, and how could they accept that declaration of Archbishop Vaughan in 1905 before the general election against that of hon. Gentlemen opposite who represented, if anybody did, the feelings and wishes of the Roman Catholic electors of this country? They had some little time before them before this matter was finally determined. It would be a week or ten days before the House would be called upon to give its decision as to the particular relief to be afforded to Roman Catholic members of the community, and he asked the Government seriously to apply their minds to this matter and to try to find out whether, as a matter of fact, Nonconformist opinion was not amenable to some modified form of Clause 4, rather than to the particular form of contracting-out which the Government had in the Bill. He believed they would find that Nonconformist opinion had no more objection to one than to the other, and he thought after the debate they had heard there should be some sympathetic consideration given to the undoubted claims of the Roman Catholics and also of the Anglicans who desired homogeneous schools.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON regretted that the Government would not accept the Amendment. It did not pledge them to adopt the new clause of the hon. Member for Mayo. But it left the door open for the consideration of some alternative to the proposals for contracting-out, which were so generally unpalatable on both sides of the House. The clause of the hon. Member for Mayo was not Clause 4 of the Bill of 1906 as it left the House of Commons, but was that clause as it returned from the House of Lords. In the House of Lords there were two additions made to it, very desirable to his mind, in regard to the constitution of the parents' committee for the control of religious instruction and the requirement that the local education authority should consult the parents' committee in the appointment of teachers.

MR. DILLON said it was very important that this should be made clear. The form in which he had put down the clause was not that in which it came from the House of Lords, but the form in which it was adopted after the debate in the House of Lords by the Liberal Government.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON was understood to say that the clause was the result of discussion in another place, and these two particular sections of the hon. Member's proposed new clause to which he had referred were printed in italics showing that they had not stood part of the clause as it left the House of Commons.

MR. DILLON said they were not put in by the House of Lords.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON said he did not think they need argue about it. If hon. Members would look at the clause they would see that these two particular subsections were printed in italics showing that they were not the product of the debates of the House of Commons.

MR. DILLON said the matter was of some importance. It was quite true that the clause was altered, but the shape in which he had put it down was not the form in which it had come from the House of Lords, but the form in which it was adopted by the Government, as announced by Lord Crewe, after debate in the House of Lords. It was the work of the Liberal Cabinet and not of the House of Lords.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON said that as the Bill came back from the Lords certain portions of the clause were printed in italics to indicate that they had not formed part of the clause as it left the House of Commons. He did not wish to carry the discussion further, but while admitting that the clause was not discussed in the House of Commons in 1903, he did not understand why, if it was accepted by the Liberal Government in the House of Lords then, the Minister for Education should be so reluctant to consider it now. Whether or not it should be accepted, it would give the opportunity for considering whether there should be an alternative proposal to contracting out. Probably the right hon. Gentleman would say there was not time enough, but that was no fault of the Opposition. They were told they were being conciliated, but that was being done under the guillotine, a curious process of conciliation. They must make the best of the position, and take their chance of any opportunity that offered of discussing this very complicated Bill. This Amendment would offer to the Roman Catholics a possibility of escaping from a very distasteful position. To them complete popular control and the appointment by the local education authority of the teachers without reference to their religion must be an impossible condition. The Roman Catholics gained nothing under this Bill, the Church of England gained the right of entry for what it was worth, but the Roman Catholics gained nothing and were entitled to the fullest consideration. What was to be their position under the Bill? Were they to be driven into a system that was distasteful to them, which they could not possibly accept, with the alternative of starvation under the contracting-out clause? Another question the Government had not taken up was that of the homogeneous schools, where the bulk of the children were of one religious belief, and where that particular religious belief might be provided for under the scheme of the school without doing harm to anybody else. If only time had been given to deal with that matter and to arrive at the compromise which conciliation demanded for making a real settlement, they might have been able to have struck out some scheme covering the whole ground, but they had not had that opportunity. This Amendment would give the Department the opportunity for offering the possibility of escaping from unpleasant alternatives, and he appealed to the Government not to let the opportunity escape. It was said that contracting out would bring variety, but the variety they wanted was the variety arising from adaptation of teaching to local needs and conditions; they did not want the variety between rich and poor schools, between efficient and non-efficient schools. He asked the Government, in the hope of a real settlement of the matter, to give full consideration to the Amendment.

MR. MADDISON said two things had emerged from the debate. The first was that the prospect of anything like a durable settlement was not a good one, and the second that the equality of treatment was not to be obtained, either by contracting out or by the proposal of the hon. Member for East Mayo. Equality could only be reached by excluding entirely all theological teaching. As one who had moved about the big towns of England, he knew that all that had been said by hon. Gentlemen from Ireland about the self-sacrifice of their own priests and of those who managed their own schools was true. They were poor, very earnest, and very determined. As he happened to belong to a religious minority very much removed from them—he had the privilege to be an Unitarian—he sympathised to the full with the plea they made on account of the poverty and earnestness of their people. He would like hon. Members from Ireland to understand the position, which was that he and other English Radicals must steadily resist their attempt to impose denominationalism upon public money. Across the track of a national educational system came great external bodies, it might be from Rome, from Canterbury, or from Geneva. If he had his way, he would not allow any of them to interfere with the national system, for if such interference were permitted it broke up the amity of that system and kept alive that bickering which was not good for education, nor, he thought, for religion. If hon. Members from Ireland—whose objection to Cowper-Templeism he shared—had joined them some time ago, the chances were that the Catholics and other bodies might have had a hand in this bargain, or treaty of peace, and without outraging a single conscience they might have devised a system by which facilities should be given for denominational teaching out of school hours. After these weary debates, these abortive proposals, these hopeless attempts to secure reconciliation among irreconcilables, the nation would one day turn to a system which would make the schools absolutely neutral in those matters which must divide us on this side of the grave.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN recognised, as the hon. Member who had just spoken recognised, that the solution which the Government proposed could not meet the idiosyncrasies of small religious bodies. To meet the views of everybody was possible only by taking the course recommended by his right hon. friend, that, without prejudice, the State should provide the religious instruction which parents desired. But if they could not do that, it was not necessary to go to the other extreme and provide no religious teaching whatever. If they could not provide what everybody wished for, that was no reason why they should provide what nobody wanted. He intended to support the clause, whether the Amendment were carried or not. He did not like the clause which the hon. Member for East Mayo had put upon the Paper; but he shared the view of the hon. Member for Oxford University that they ought not, at this stage of the Bill, to exclude the possibility of reaching in their deliberations some scheme more palatable to many of their fellow-citizens.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Captain Donelan and Mr.
 Patrick O'Brien.

Whereupon the CHAIRMAN left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (ENGLAND AND WALES) [GRANTS].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That it is expedient to authorise the payment of Parliamentary Grants to associations of schools in respect of every public elementary school belonging to such associations, and of a Parliamentary Grant in respect of instruction given in special subjects at centres, in pursuance of any Act of the present session to make further provision with respect to Elementary Education in England and Wales."—(Mr. Runciman.)

Question put forthwith, in pursuance of the Order of the House of 27th November, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY ORDER CONFIRMATION BILL (BY ORDER).

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [17th November], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil) said he rose to move the rejection of the measure. It was long and complicated. It proposed among other things to take over several existing railway companies and place them under the control and authority of the North British Railway Company, also to build new lines and take over docks and harbours. In the provisions of the Bill the interests of various people were carefully safeguarded—the interests of the shareholders in the railways affected, the interests of the Postmaster-General, the interests of traders and shippers, of harbour dues and carrying rates, the interests of the ratepayers of Leven, and so on. But there was one class of people whose interests were not safeguarded. Under the Schedules it was specified that the North British Railway Company should appoint and pay all agents, officers, booking and other clerks, servants, porters and other persons and so on who were working the railway. He desired some assurance that the interests of the servants of the company taken over under the Bill should be safeguarded and their rights as citizens protected in a way that the present employees could not be said to enjoy. The company had a standing rule that all its employees must be at its disposal not merely during the working hours, but during the whole twenty-four hours of the day. That had been interpreted to mean that a servant of the company was prohibited from serving on any public body to which he might be elected, although its meetings were held during the hours when he was not on duty. They were not asking that servants of the railway company should be free to accept public positions which called them away from their duties during working hours, but they felt strongly on the point that during the time they were not on duty these men should be as free to accept positions of trust and responsibility to which they might be elected as any other members of the community. What they asked was that an assurance should be given of a definite kind that what had already happened in connection with the town council of Ladybank should not be repeated with the new people contemplated to be taken over under the Bill. Six members of the town council of Ladybank were employees of the company, and each had been compelled under threat of dismissal to resign his position on the council. A deputation of townspeople, including the provost and the parish minister, waited upon the manager of the company to plead the cause of these men, but the manager was obdurate and insisted that he had a right to control the whole of their time. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade had read at Question-time a letter from the manager in which this sentence occurred—

“The company has no intention to enforce any restriction upon its employees to prevent them serving the town council so long as such service is not inconsistent with their duty to the company.”

It was not, however, alleged that the fact that these six men were acting on the town council in any way interfered with their duty as railway servants. The town clerk was also local agent to the railway company, and some of these men had occasion to criticise some charges he made for services alleged to have been rendered, and two days following their criticism the leader of the six was warned to resign from the council under pain of being dismissed. He had to resign, and the other five followed in quick succession. Since then two employees of the company who acted as chairman and secretary of the ratepayers' association had also been compelled to resign under a similar threat, which was actually carried out in the case of the chairman. This was a condition of servitude which would find little sympathy and no support, he hoped, in any quarter of the House. Unless satisfactory assurances were forthcoming they would do their best to defeat the Bill, or failing that, to have clauses inserted to safeguard the rights of citizenship of the employees of the company. They would fight strenuously if necessary to secure that railway servants should not be deprived of the rights of citizenship so long as the exercise of those rights did not conflict with their duty to the company.

*MR. MORTON (Sutherland), in seconding, thoroughly agreed with the statement that no company ought to have the right of interfering with the rights of citizens. If a man went to a meeting of any kind in his own time, no company had a right to say he should not do it, and that if he did he would be dismissed. He rather thought they would not go so far as that in Russia or any other uncivilised country. If a company got favours from the State and a monopoly with regard to its business it had no right to say that men should not do so-and-so in their own time. He had been informed that this company proposed to take Leven Harbour or Dock and close it, or do what they pleased with it, without any recompense to the real owners, and that the clause referring to that had been put in without the usual notice which enabled parties concerned to defend themselves. That was another reason why they should carefully look into this Bill. Another complaint that had reached him was as the way in which the company kept their spare engine-drivers and firemen hanging about. The men complained that after hanging about all day they were not fit to do a night's work on a locomotive; that it was a danger not only to themselves, but to the public. He hoped the President of the Board of Trade would see that not only the men but the public were protected from dangers which might arise from that cause. His main object, however, in intervening was the question of third-class sleeping carriages. As long ago as 1882 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, stated that whenever a public company came to get favours and monopolies granted to them by Parliament the public had a right to see that their grievances were redressed before further favours were granted. Not only had nothing been done with regard to third-class sleeping accommodation, but the company had actually raised the price of week-end tickets by 20 per cent. The railway company said the first-class sleeping carriages did not pay, but everybody knew there was a loss on all first-class traffic. That loss had to be met out of the profit made on third-class traffic. That was a reason why third class passengers should be treated at least as well as those who travelled first-class. He could not see why the sleeping accommodation given to first-class passengers should be paid for by third-class passengers. He gladly recognised that the Board of Trade had tried to assist him in this matter, and he hoped to have their further assistance. He warned the railway companies that some night it would be possible to punish them by throwing out a Bill. He was told that the North British Railway Company had not been doing very well. He found on inquiry that that was entirely their own fault. It was due to their own bad management. They had wasted a million of money in building a great hotel at Edinburgh, they had wasted other millions on useless undertakings, and then they had the impudence—he used the word advisedly—to come to Parliament and say that the public must pay for the loss they had incurred. His constituents were very much interested in the claim that the railway companies should be required to provide third-class sleeping accommodation. They were about 700 miles distant, and he wished them to have reasonable opportunity of coming to London in comfort. Unless he got a satisfactory reply he would insist on going to a division. The public had a right to demand for third-class traffic similar accommodation to that given to first-class.

Amendment proposed—

“To leave out the word ‘now,’ and at the end of the Question to add the words ‘upon this day three months.’”—(Mr. Keir Hardie.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

MR. J. M. HENDERSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) said the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire was asking a little too much when he asked for third-class sleeping carriages. If such carriages were provided, the trains would be inconveniently long. If the railway companies could afford to give the accommodation asked, he would not object, but he did not think the suggestion was practicable. He wished to call attention to a more serious matter. An alteration was made in the night mails from Aberdeen, which meant that the delivery of letters from his own and other northern constituencies was delayed in the South until the following day. Their conveyance took forty-eight instead of twenty-four hours. He made representation on the subject to the railway companies, and through the good offices of the Secretary to the Board of Trade they had met the request made to them in this respect. A conference of railway representatives was held, and the result was that the companies had agreed to restore the mail service to what it had formerly been, the alteration to take place in the beginning of May. He was bound to say that the North British Company met them quite fairly. He could understand the difficulties they were in. Although their station in Edinburgh was large, it was not all that could be desired, and it was not an easy matter arranging the traffic. He desired to thank his hon. friend the Secretary to the Board of Trade for the ready assistance he had given in the matter.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir H. KEARLEY, Devonport) said the House would remember that the debate on the Second Reading of this Bill was adjourned in order that the conference to which his hon. friend had referred, might be held. He was glad to be able to confirm the statement made by his hon. friend. The railway companies had agreed not precisely to the arrangement existing before but to restore the mail connection so that those districts north of Aberdeen which were cut out would now be able to enjoy the mail service in the same way as they had done for many years past. The hon. Member for Sutherlandshire had brought forward a topic which he had been pressing on the attention of the House for the past three years. He hoped the hon. Member recognised that the action of the Board of Trade in the matter had been sympathetic. In 1906 when the question of third-class sleeping accommodation was raised, he undertook to approach the managers of the various railway companies which ran trains long distances with the view of seeing whether they could be induced to give their favourable consideration to the suggestion. The Board of Trade had been unable to induce them to make the concession. The companies pointed out that the provision of third-class sleeping carriages would involve a financial loss. Not being satisfied his hon. friend again brought up the question in 1907, and he himself then supported the idea that third-class sleeping accommodation should be provided. He pointed out that the third-class passenger was really the backbone of railway traffic, and that he enabled the railway companies to pay dividends. The figures showed that third-class passengers were enormously greater than the second and third-class. He was not able to do more, but if the hon. Gentleman took the opportunity to move a Motion or introduce a Bill, so as to let the House of Commons have a formal debate on the matter, and if the decision of the House of Commons was in favour of his hon. friend's action, then he was certain the railway company would reconsider the matter.

*MR. MORTON: Will the Government give me time to bring in and carry a Bill?

SIR H. KEARLEY said that the hon. Gentleman knew how to take advantage of every opportunity which offered of bringing this matter before the House of Commons, as had been shown by his heroic record in connection with the tramways. With regard to the point raised by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil—viz., the treatment by the railway companies of their servants who took part in municipal affairs—when this Bill was under discussion a fortnight ago he promised that he would take advantage of the directors of the North British Railway Company being present, to act as a friend at Court as between the Company and the men with regard to this grievance. He had placed the case which had been stated to him by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil by letter, before the general manager and directors of the Railway Company, and at their request he sent a copy of that letter to the general manager. He had had an interview that day with the general manager, and asked him for an assurance that in future no such interpretation would be placed on the standing rule of the company as to prevent employees, when their services were not required by the company, exercising their rights of citizenship; and he was now able to give, on behalf of the company, an assurance on these terms—

“The directors of the North British Railway Company authorise me to say that the employees of the company shall be left free to discharge public duties, and to exercise freely their rights of citizenship during those hours when they are not on duty for the railway company.”

He hoped that the hon. Member after that assurance would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. KEIR HARDIE asked leave to withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

MR. YOUNGER (Ayr Burghs) said he wished to move that the Bill be referred to a Joint Committee of Lords and Commons with respect to Clause 26, which dealt with the closing of Leven Harbour. The Commission in settling this clause dealt with new matter of a very important character, but no previous notice of it had been given to the owner of the Solum at Leven Harbour. They did not want to override their system of Private Bill legislation by any general rehearing or revision, but it was an entirely different matter to order the hearing of a point which had not been heard. Mr. Christie had not seen the plans of the works to be placed on the land, and he was inclined to agree with him that this House ought to grant a rehearing. He was fortified in that contention by what the Lord-Advocate said in the Arizona case, in which the right hon. Gentleman said he did not find any suggestion that the matter was not argued in full previously, or that any new fact was brought before this House. In effect he said there must be some new facts brought forward to those which were before the Commissioners, or some gross blunder proved to have been made by the Commissioners, before such a rehearing would be allowed. He contended that here there were new facts, that these facts were of very great importance, and that such protection as the clause granted to Mr. Christie in his absence, and his compensation, and his mineral rights, should be properly safeguarded. He was entitled to have a rehearing with the plans and sections of the jetty and all these works presented for consideration. He did not think Mr. Christie had made any unreasonable request. He would not discuss the various points at length, but would content himself with making this general statement. He begged to move that the Bill be referred to a Joint Committee of Lords and Commons.

MR. DUNDAS WHITE (Dumbartonshire) seconded. He said he did not think it was necessary for him to add much, but it seemed to him that special care ought to be given to the proposal to close one of these East of Scotland ports, and to enable one of the railway companies to set aside the obligations imposed under an Act of Parliament. This port was constituted in 1876, the Leven Harbour Company being the undertakers. Then it was passed on to somebody else, and from that somebody else it passed in 1889 into the hands of the North British Railway Company. From that time the railway company had neglected the obligations by which their rights were accompanied, viz., to keep the harbour open and in a fit condition to be used by vessels. They neglected to do that, and the harbour gradually silted up. Then the proprietor of the soil, from whom they bought, insisted upon their fulfilling their statutory obligations, and went to the Court of Session. That Court pronounced against the railway company, and issued an order to the effect that the place should be kept properly, and that the proprietor should be entitled to keep it in order himself and charge the railway company. The company did not appeal from that decision, but came before the House of Commons with a Bill, and by a clause got rid of their obligations, altogether overriding the decision of the Court of Session. The proprietor had had no opportunity of stating his case, and under these circumstances he supported what the hon. Member for Ayr Burghs had said. He believed there was one precedent in a similar case, but he need not go into it; he thought this was a case in which the House might very well refer this particular clause to a Joint Committee in order that it should receive particularly careful attention. He begged to second.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed to a Joint Committee of Lords and Commons."—(Mr. Younger).

*MR. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.) said he appeared for the first time in opposition to the hon. Member for Ayr Burghs and he was glad that it was on a matter of personal and individual rather than of national importance. The hon. Member had referred to previous occasions in which attempts had been made in this House to refer Bills to a Joint Committee, and he candidly stated that there was only one in the history of Provisional Orders in Scotland on which such a reference was made. He thought that was a case where the Edinburgh Tramways Company had applied before the Commissioners for "loans," but it was refused and when they came before this House it was granted. In all the other cases no similar permission had been granted. His hon. friend had quoted the Lord-Advocate, and he thought that right hon. Gentleman had adopted a very sound argument when he said that no rehearing should take place except under special circumstances. Lord Balfour, who was then Secretary for Scotland, used similar terms, as also did Sir Robert Reid, now Lord Chancellor, and other authorities, who said that no Bills should be sent to a Joint Committee unless there was substantially a special case, and new matter had arisen. This Provisional Order now under discussion came in the ordinary course before the Commissioners who consisted of Lord Falkland and Lord Strathmore and two Members of this House who were very much respected. They heard all the evidence for four days, and went into all these points, and he ventured to say that no special circumstances had arisen which demanded a re-hearing, no new facts had been brought forward and no new point had been raised which was not considered by the Commissioners. Last of all, these four Commissioners were unanimous in arriving at their decision. His hon. friend said that no notice was given to Mr. Christie, but when objections were raised before the Examiner of Bills, an impartial authority, he declared that the Standing Orders had been complied with. Then as to whether the notice was given or not, the North British Railway applied for various powers to deal with this harbour as they wished, to sell it or to do what they liked with it. The Commissioners cut down those powers and said they must make roads, give some land to the borough, and do various other things. The greater included the less and, if the railway company applied for the fullest powers their notice might be held to cover the more limited powers which were conferred upon them by the Commissioners. The question whether Mr. Christie still had some claim was a legal point which the House was hardly competent to deal with. The Commissioners had decided that his case should be kept open and if he could establish his claim the railway company undertook to pay him compensation under the Lands Clauses Act, giving him the full value of his right plus 10 per cent. The Bill did not abolish the harbour. It only closed the dock and for reasons which appealed to everyone in the neighbourhood. Owing to the situation of the dock, within twenty yards of the main sewer, it had been condemned by the public health officer who had been health officer for seventeen years, and who said the dock was a perfect cesspool and was injurious to the health of the locality. The town council said the basin of the dockyard was a filthy nuisance.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): That is not the fault of the dock which was there fifty years before the sewer.

MR. COCHRANE did not think that made any difference. The dock was no longer required for its previous purpose. The enormous docks of Methil had grown up on which the company had spent millions of money. The Commissioners and the public health authority and the borough authorities were satisfied that Leven Dock ought to be closed and the Leven branch of the Miners' Union had also declared that they desired to see it closed. Only one individual held out and he had been offered full and fair compensation if he could prove any claim to it. No case had been made out for sending the Bill to a joint Committee.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire) said it was a very small point that had been brought before the House. The hon. Member for North Ayrshire had described with great clearness the situation, and he had very little to add to his statement of the facts of the case. Mr. Christie was the only objector to the Bill, and it was in his interest that the Motion was brought forward. There was no ground of objection on the part of Mr. Christie on the ground of notice. The Examiner of Bills had decided that point and it was perfectly clear. The Commission had heard Mr. Christie's case, which was one of objection to a clause less favourable to his interests than the clause as it at present stood. His case was not that the clause was less favourable but that new facts had been brought forward which were not covered by the notice and which had not been before the Commission. As a matter of fact, neither of these objections held good.

MR. MOONEY (Newry): Was Mr. Christie allowed to be heard on the new clause which was brought forward on the inquiry stage of the Bill?

MR. SINCLAIR: He elected to stand out.

MR. MOONEY: Did he apply through his counsel, Mr. Scott-Dickson, to be heard on the matter, and did the Committee sitting in Scotland refuse to hear him, or did he allege that there was no power to deal with the clause as it was not contained in the notice?

MR. SINCLAIR said he had his opportunity of being heard and refused to take it.

MR. YOUNGER: My information is that Mr. Scott-Dickson refused to go on, because he was not seized of the facts. He had no notice of any kind. The agreement was made behind Mr. Christie's back, and he was not in a position to go on.

MR. SINCLAIR said he understood it was not made behind his back. The company would have been very glad to treat with Mr. Christie as they had treated with other parties, but Mr. Christie chose to refrain from taking the opportunity which he certainly had of coming to an agreement in the matter. As to Mr. Christie's legal rights, the Commission had come to no decision. Unless there was very grave reason, and there was no such grave reason in this case, the Motion should be rejected.

MR. MOONEY said it was only to preserve the reputation which had always belonged to Private Bill Committees that he intervened. As he understood it, the reason why the decisions of Private Bill Committees were so unanimously upheld was that any person, no matter how remote his interest, if he could prove that he had an interest which would be affected by any Bill, got the fullest and fairest consideration before any Committee. He understood that Mr. Christie alleged that he was injuriously affected by the Bill as originally proposed. The Committee sat and inquired into the clauses of the Bill, and at the last moment new clauses were brought forward, and Mr. Scott-Dickson, on behalf of Mr. Christie, protested that the Committee were going outside the deposited plans. He should be very sorry to interfere with the decision of a Committee sitting in Scotland to decide a purely Scottish question; but, if they had departed from the ordinary course, laid down by that House, he thought they ought to exercise their revising power, which he admitted only ought to be exercised on rare occasions, and allow the complainant to go before a Joint Committee. He did not think, from their knowledge of Mr. Scott-Dickson, that he would have made the statement attributed to him that the clause inserted in the Bill went outside the deposited plans if he had not thought that was so; but, if the right hon. Gentlemen could assure him that Mr. Scott-Dickson was under a misapprehension, he would not support any Motion to send the Bill to a Joint Committee. If, however, there had been a departure from the ordinary procedure, he did not think it would add to the high reputation possessed by Private Bill Committees to allow any individual to go away with the idea that he had been unfairly treated. It would be better to stretch a point and allow that person to appear before a Joint Committee rather than he should think he was suffering under a grievance. Under those circumstances, if Mr. Scott-Dickson was correct, he should vote in favour of the Motion; but if the right hon. Gentleman could assure him that the statement was made under a misapprehension, he should not support the Motion, because he was in favour of delegating these matters to the local people who knew all the circumstances.

*MR. MORTON said that one of the safeguards against lobbying which the two Houses had established was the very strict regulations to notice. He understood the railway company were under a statutory obligation to maintain the harbour and dock and were also by the decree of the Quarter Sessions required to restore it to a state of efficiency for public use. In face of that it certainly seemed extraordinary that without the consent of those interested they were going to take the harbour or dock away—to sell or do anything they liked with it—and give no recompense to the owner. He agreed that if anybody felt a grievance—and especially when the ordinary procedure as to notice had been broken—they ought to be as lenient as possible and give redress by allowing them in cases of importance to go before a Joint Committee of the Lords and Commons, and have their case heard. He was very anxious that the strict rules made by both Houses as to the giving of notice and the handing in of plans and other information should be adhered to for the protection of everybody and the prevention of lobbying which would surely occur if they allowed those rules to be broken with impunity.

Mr. SINCLAIR said he did not think it was a question of relying on the good faith or character of Mr. Scott-Dickson, or any other counsel engaged in the case. The question really was whether Mr. Scott-Dickson had fair notice of the objections he had to meet. There was no doubt that two authorities in their separate spheres had decided that he had fair notice. In the first place, the Commissioners were decidedly of the view that he had. He was fully heard by them and they came to a unanimous decision. There was the further point whether the notice given by the company in these proceedings covered the form which the clause ultimately took. That was a matter which was referred to the Examiner of Bills, who decided that the notice given to Mr Christie covered what had been done by the Committee. There was really no doubt on these two points.

Mr. MOONEY asked if a protest was made by Mr. Scott-Dickson against the competency of the Committee to insert this clause? Was there any ruling given on that point?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Certainly. I have just said so.

Mr. MORTON: Was the plan referred to deposited with the Secretary for Scotland in time?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD (Liverpool, West Derby) said supposing a man who was interested in some property had not had notice of a Private Bill, if his counsel appeared it was quite clear that it had been waived. Counsel might or might not proceed upon some further point, but if he appeared at all any prior question of notice was waived. The hon. Gentleman had made a mistake in stating there was no provision here for compensation for Mr. Christie. Subsequently this very clause, said—

"In the event of Robert Maith or his successors making any claim of, or interest in, the site in two years any is to give him full compensation

*Mr. MORTON: It is said going to close the harbour and this man does not want it closed.

Mr. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD said they were not going to take it away but simply to close up. There could only be three persons interested in the property. First there was the owner of the railway company. Then the individual who came forward. "My predecessors sold this to the railway company for the purpose of a dock, and if it is not to be used for a dock any longer to have a right in the soil." This was a very curious contention, and he quite understood that when preliminary notices were given no one thought that some claim, owing to some understanding, existed at some time which was entitled in reversion to the property back. The question was disposed of and the irregularity was disposed of in a careful way in which the object was that every interested party should get the proper notice. Who was to be interested in the property? Ordinary persons who lived near the property in the neighbourhood were represented by the local authorities who were parties to the Bill. In all these cases arrangements were some by way of concession. Roads and pieces of land were given by these concessions were not in the original plans. It was said that there was anything irregular about all the parties interested had not been made a sensible arrangement was included in the Bill. It was to have compensation if his claim and anything fair and reasonable it would be difficult to stand. After all the criticism had been passed on the railway company about points which were not in the Bill it was almost time they allowed these important works, which the railway company was going to carry out, to be authorised.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS (Glasgow, Camlachie) entered a word of expostulation against the time of the House being occupied upon the pleading of a private right on such slender grounds. A most extraordinary claim was put forward by the man who sold the dock, and was paid in cash and shares. The dock was thoroughly useless and antiquated, had only a very small draught of water, was not more than an acre in extent, and during the last six years hardly a vessel had come into it except for one firm. It was an attempt by a landowner, through his personal friends, to extort a larger price from the railway company.

MR. YOUNGER: I have never seen Mr. Christie in my life.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS said he was glad that fact had come out. He had never heard a more flimsy case in his life. He had thought this was a case of an attempt to obtain compensation for which there was no title, and that opportunities were being used which ought not to be used to prevent the passage of Bills in order to promote private interests.

MR. MOONEY: May I ask whether the hon. Member is in order in attributing motives to Members of the House? I have no connection with and have never seen Mr. Christie.

*MR. SPEAKER: The intervention of the hon. Member showed that the observations of the speaker were made without knowledge. I understood him to withdraw them.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS: Certainly. I am rather pleased that any observations I made were the means by which this fact was brought out.

Mr. William Rutherford.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): May I ask whether the hon. Member is entitled to make insinuations as to the motives which move hon. Members in bringing a matter before the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: Certainly not. I thought I had made that clear. The hon. Member for Glasgow is not entitled to make observations of that kind. When they were contradicted, I understood him to say he regretted he had made them, and that they were not in accordance with the facts.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS: I certainly withdraw immediately any remark which could be at all offensive. I said I was glad the opportunity had arisen in order that the facts might be made known.

MR. DUNDAS WHITE: The suggestion the hon. Member made was that those who opposed this were actuated by personal acquaintance and personal motives. I beg absolutely to disclaim both, and I ask him to withdraw his observation.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS said he had withdrawn the remark. What he ventured to submit was that the time of the House had been occupied at a late hour in the casting of a slur upon the operations of a Committee in Scotland which, in its discussions up to now, had been singularly successful. He thought that they ought to do what they could to prevent the recurrence of such incidents.

Question put, and negatived.

Bill to be considered to-morrow.

Whereupon Mr. SPEAKER, in pursuance of the Order of the House of 31st July, adjourned the House without Question put.

LOCAL REGISTRATION (IRELAND) AMENDMENT

[SECOND READING]

Order of the Day Reading read.

LORD ATKINSON: Bill is designed to meet have arisen in the the Labourers Act by parties in Ireland. There been caused owing to omission, on the part for the bodies concerned conveyance of the land the purpose of the erection cottages. The Bill, both sides in the House and the circumstance arose are these. There a register, kept in Local Registration Act of 1891, which is conferring great benefits, and it is proved conveyance is registered is conclusive proof of tending purchaser, the to search the register not find the entry of upon the land, he may complete security, or, encumbrance registered sure that that is the case he can be affected. Under law of the Court of Chancery purchased land known time that the person who chased it had either another person or created upon it, the land in the purchaser would not be charges; but in order should work effectively to abolish that doctrine done by Section 34 of the Act of 1891, the entry on the register being made conclusive evidence of title in the absence of absolute fraud. What happened in several cases was this. The local authority purchased land and paid for it, but unfortunately omitted to register the conveyance. The Irish being a simple people, it thereupon occurred to the vendor that he might do a stroke of business by selling the land a second time. This he did, the purchaser knowing perfectly well that the land had already been disposed of to the local authority. But inasmuch as the statute enacted that the register could not be corrected except in the case of actual fraud, and the vendor could not be held to have been guilty of fraud, owing to the purchaser having had notice of the conveyance to the local authority, it became necessary, if the local authority were to obtain the land for which they had paid, for a way to be made whereby the omission to register might be rectified. The Bill, therefore, provides that where any rural district council shall have omitted to register, pursuant to the provisions of the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act, 1891, its ownership of any parcel of land acquired by it under the powers of the Labourers (Ireland) Acts, 1883 to 1906, and it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Court that the registered owner of the lands of which such parcel forms a part had, at or before the time when he was registered as owner, notice of the acquisition of such parcel by the rural district council, or was otherwise in equity bound to give effect thereto, the Court may, upon the application of the rural district council, and after such notices as it may direct, order the register to be rectified by inserting therein the district council as registered owners of such parcel, and amending registration as to acreage or otherwise as may be just and necessary, and upon such terms as to costs as to the Court shall seem just. Before, however, con-

ting to take charge of this Bill in Lordships' House, I informed the persons interested in it that in Committee I would move an Amendment to provide that it should only apply to transactions which occurred before 1st March, 1908; although I admit the necessity for this Bill in order to enable local authorities to get land for which they have paid, I am quite confident that it is not a good precedent.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(Lord Atkinson.)

LORD DENMAN: My Lords, after the very clear explanation which the noble and learned Lord has given of this measure, I do not think it is necessary for me to enter into any detail upon it, or to make any comments of my own upon the simplicity of certain persons in Ireland which has rendered the passing of this Bill necessary. I will only say that the Government offered no opposition to the Bill in the House of Commons, and therefore they do not intend to put any obstacle in the way of its passing through this House.

LORD ASHBOURNE: My Lords, after the statement made by my noble and learned friend Lord Atkinson I shall not offer any opposition to this Bill. But, none the less, I regard it as a very great misfortune that such a Bill should be submitted to Parliament, and I am quite sure the learned Judge at the head of the administration of the Act of 1891 deeply regrets that Parliament should be invoked in reference to this matter. It is really a serious and dangerous blow at the administration of local registration of title in Ireland. The Act of 1891 was a clear and useful measure, requiring that all transactions in relation to land in Ireland should find their place upon the register, and declaring that any person dealing in land could be satisfied that he was in an invulnerable position if he found no record to the contrary on the register. That got rid of the doctrine of notice, which had been carried to a vast extent in reference to previous Acts and which left no one at all certain as to how he stood. If once you depart from the clear requirement in the Act of 1891 that the register must show all the dealings with land, you introduce great uncertainty. My noble and learned friend Lord Atkinson, who is as familiar as anyone with the administration of this legislation, has given the weight of his high authority to the Bill, but I did not gather that there was any enthusiasm in his mind in reference to it; and I think the Amendment he foreshadowed is wise, as showing that no loophole will be left for any suggestion that this is to be regarded as a general opening to a loose construction of existing legislation. I hope the passing of this Bill, even in its amended form, will not be looked upon in any part of Ireland as evidence that the stringency of the administration of existing Acts of Parliament is viewed at all lightly in either House of Parliament.

On Question, Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

Copy presented, of Order No. 7610, dated 25th November, 1908, permitting the landing at Deptford Foreign Animals Wharf of Animals carried on board the s.s. "Minneapolis" [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

Return ordered, "relative to National Education in Ireland, showing: (1) Number of Roman Catholic National Schools in Ireland, number of Roman Catholic Teachers, principal and assistants, with amount of their Salaries, and number of Roman Catholic Children on the rolls; (2) Number of Non-Catholic National Schools in Ireland, with the average daily attendance, number of Non-Catholic Teachers, principal and assistants, with the amount of their Salaries; (3) Number of Roman Catholic National Schools with an average daily attendance of from 10 to 15, with the Salaries and Emoluments of the Teachers of such Schools; (4) Number of Non-Catholic National Schools in Ireland with an average attendance of from 10 to 15, with the Salaries and Emoluments of the Teachers of such Schools; (5) in how many Roman Catholic National Schools has Rule 127 (b) been imposed, and in how many Non-Catholic Schools has Rule 127 (b) been imposed; (6) how many Roman Catholic National Schools have been amalgamated since 1900, and how many Non-Catholic National Schools during the same time; (7) how many Roman Catholic Inspectors and how many Non-Catholic Inspectors were in the employment of the National Board in the year 1900; (8) how many Roman Catholic Inspectors and how many Non-Catholic Inspectors are in the service of the Board at the present time; and (9) how many Roman Catholic assistant or temporary Inspectors and how many Non-Catholic assistant or temporary Inspectors are employed by the National Board at present."—(Mr. John Phillips.)

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS
CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Education Bill—School Attendance.

MR. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether, under the Education Bill, it will be the duty of the local education authority to see that all children attend school at 9 a.m.; and whether children in contracted-out schools will be in the same position as those in provided schools as to competition for scholarships in secondary schools, sharing in services of medical inspectors.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The Education Bill makes no alteration in the law of school attendance, except in so far as Clause 1 (3) prevents a child being compelled to attend a purely denominational school unless the parent has himself selected that school in preference to sending his child to an undenominational school. In regard to the second paragraph of the Question the Bill places no hindrance in the way of children in the schools referred to being equally eligible with children in other public elementary schools for scholarships in secondary schools, and, so far as scholarships made available by schemes under the Charitable Trusts and Endowed Schools Acts are concerned, such children will necessarily be equally eligible with the children in provided schools. In regard to the concluding paragraph, the Bill provides that the duty of local authorities in the matter of medical inspection of children in public elementary schools shall apply to the denominational schools under the Bill as well as to the provided schools.

Colwyn Bay Pier.

MR. MCARTHUR (Liverpool, Kirkdale): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the recent legal decision that the Colwyn Bay pier is an unauthorised structure free from all Board of Trade obligations and restrictions, it is the intention of the Board to take any action with respect to the said pier.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case to which the hon. Member refers was only given on the 18th instant, and I am not disposed to take any action in the matter until the owner of the pier has had a reasonable time to consider his position. I understand that it is possible that he may seek for Parliamentary sanction in respect of the undertaking next session.

New Scottish Fishery Cruiser.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is now able to state when the new Fishery Board cruiser is likely to be at the disposal of the Fishery Board for Scotland.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) The new cruiser is expected to be ready by 31st March next.

Lighting of the Coast of Ross-shire.

MR. WEIR: To ask the Secretary for Scotland in view of the unsatisfactory lighting of the coast on the western mainland of Ross-shire, will he suggest to the Northern Lighthouse Commissioners the expediency of establishing a light on Rhue Rhea or at some other suitable point between Rona Island and Stoer Head light.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The proposals of the Northern Lighthouse Commissioners for the current financial year included provision for a lighthouse and fog-signal on Rhue Rhea, and the Board of Trade have given their statutory sanction to the work.

Blake Estate, County Galway—Case of William Forde.

MR. JOHN O'DONNELL (Mayo, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether anything has been done by the Estates Commissioners to remedy the grievance of William Forde, a tenant on the Blake estate situate at Ballindereen, County Galway; whether they took any steps to ascertain the condition of things in connection with the stripping of that estate and the wrong done Forde excepting through the inspector, who treated the tenant harshly on the occasion; and whether, if the several plots now in the possession of Forde will be surrendered by him, they would give him a holding of land on some other estate where there are grass lands available for distribution.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have inquired fully into Forde's case, and do not consider he has any grievance. He holds a farm of about thirteen acres, comprising six separate plots, and, with a view to rearranging the holdings on the estate, the Commissioners offered to give him a new holding of about thirty-nine acres if he surrendered the six plots. This he at first said he would do, but subsequently refused, and the thirty-nine acres were otherwise allotted. If he informs the Commissioners that he is now willing to surrender the plots in question and to take other land in their stead, the matter will be considered when the Commissioners have land available.

The House of Commons Treat

MR. VERNEY (Buckingham): To ask the Prime Minister what can give to the House of Commons the rule governing the consent of the House to treaties with foreign powers are finally ratified, as regards those treaties of accession or cession with regard to those treaties the personal privilege of the property of British subjects with regard to those treaties change in statute law (Answered by Mr. Balfour.) It is as stated in my last answer. The Member for Donegal last, and in the supplement to my hon. friend, in what a treaty involves any change in law the assent of Parliament.

but I may add that in the case of any treaty which would require a vote of the House to provide funds to carry it into effect it would, no doubt, be proper that the sum required should be submitted to the House before the treaty was ratified. There is no rule requiring that the other matters referred to in the Question should be brought before the House, nor has it been the practice to do so.

Roscommon Agricultural and Technical Committee.

MR. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): To ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture (Ireland) whether the Department has held an inquiry relating to the management of its business by the County Roscommon Agricultural and Technical Committee, and to the conduct of certain officials of that body; whether the inquiry was full, public, and on oath; what the findings were on so much of the matter as was disclosed; and whether it is with his sanction that the person whose conduct was most seriously involved still occupies the same position and receives public money through the Department.

(Answered by Mr. T. W. Russell.) The Department have held no formal inquiry into the matter apparently referred to in this Question. The allegations which concerned the private conduct of an official of the County Roscommon Agricultural and Technical Instruction Committee were not brought formally before the Department but were brought privately under the notice of the Vice-President, who found, on making personal inquiries in Roscommon, that the matter was the subject of legal proceedings. These were pending at the time, and no further information in the matter has been conveyed to the Department. The official in question is an officer of the Roscommon County Committee, and there has never been any information or evidence which would call for the Department's interference with the discretion of the Committee in the matter.

John Bass's Charity at Birstall.

MR. WALKER (Leicestershire, Melton): To ask the hon. Member for the Barnstaple Division, as representing the Charity Commissioners, with reference to John Bass's Charity at Birstall, in the County of Leicestershire, as described on pp. 367-8 of the Report of the year 1839 dealing with the charities in that county, what advantages are now obtained by the inhabitants of the place, or any of them, in regard to the pasturage of cattle, or otherwise, as contemplated in the said charity.

(Answered by Mr. Soares.) The last paragraph of the Report referred to shows that the charity had even at that time failed as to part as being void under the Mortmain Act. As to the rest, a right of agistment for six cows, a letter was written to the vicar of the parish in 1862 inquiring whether the right was still exercised, and the Commissioners were informed in reply that it had been taken from the poor for twenty years or more before. The Commissioners have no further information about the charity.

Sleeping Accommodation of Irish Farm Labourers Working in England.

MR. FFRENCH (Wexford, S.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that Irish migratory labourers in numerous instances, having returned to their homes after harvesting in England, have been found suffering from pulmonary consumption, traceable to the sleeping places called Paddy houses, in which Irish farm labourers are permitted to be housed in England; whether he is aware that these houses are dark, unventilated barns, in which the men have to sleep in coarse bags on the floor; and whether the sanitary authority can compel English farmers to give proper sleeping accommodation to their labourers; and, if so, will he see that the law is put in force.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I am not in possession of any information to show that pulmonary consumption amongst Irish labourers has been caused in the way suggested. At the same time, I am aware that the temporary accommodation provided for migratory labourers, such as navvies, hop-pickers, strawberry and vegetable pickers, is not unfrequently used for those engaged in harvesting, and that this accommodation is often unsatisfactory, though it is tending to improve. One of the medical inspectors of the Local Government Board is, by my direction, now engaged in investigating the conditions under which migratory labourers are housed. A report which he has already made with regard to hop-pickers has led to action being taken by the local authorities, and I am shortly expecting a further report from him in relation to other branches of the subject, which will, I believe, contain some definite recommendations with regard to the matter.

Unemployed Distress at Southwick-on-Wear.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can state, in order to get a share of the £300,000 set apart by the Government for unemployment, whether it is absolutely essential that an area like Southwick-on-Wear, with a population of about 15,000 and a large amount of distress due to unemployment, must set up a distress committee; and, if not, whether the Government contemplate making arrangements to meet the needs of such areas on their putting forward schemes for the unemployed.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) As I have stated in answer to previous Questions, the Parliamentary grant was voted for contributions in aid of expenses under the Unemployed Workmen Act. Hence, in such a case as that mentioned by my hon. friend, I can only make payments from the grant if a distress committee is set up. I am, however, willing in this instance, on the receipt of some further necessary information, to consider whether a distress committee might not be established.

Hop Industry—Recommendations of the Select Committee.

SIR W. J. COLLINS (St. Pancras, W.): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, what steps the Board have taken or propose to take with a view to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee on the Hop Industry whereby the Board would furnish hop-growers in this country with information in regard to the industry in foreign countries, both as to improved methods of culture and as to the state of foreign markets.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) The Board have this matter under their careful consideration; but it is not possible as yet to make any statement on the subject.

Old-Age Pensions Regulations.

MR. C. H. CORBETT (Sussex, East Grinstead): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether a woman whose son under compulsion from the guardians pays her 1s. a week through the relieving officer is by this payment disqualified from receiving an old-age pension.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) My right hon. friend has asked me to reply to this Question. In the case put, the woman, as I understand, receives 1s. from the relieving officer and the son repays the amount to the funds of the guardians. In such a case the woman, as I am advised, would be disqualified.

Market House on the Harlech Estate.

MR. GINNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners will accede to the wish of the inhabitants of Finea, Westmeath, to have the untenanted market-house on the Harlech estate made available for their common use in future; if not, what are their reasons for refusing; and how do they propose to deal with that building.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The estate is being sold to the tenants by the owner. The purchase agreements were only lodged in March last, and it will therefore be some time before the Commissioners come to deal with it in its order of priority. No agreement in respect of the market-house has been lodged with the Commissioners.

Use of Bogland on Lord Harlech's Finea Estate.

MR. GINNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, in view of local differences of opinion as to the arrangements made by the Estates Commissioners for use of the bog on Lord Harlech's Finea estate, Westmeath, and dissatisfaction with those arrangements as understood, whether he will ascertain and state fully how the Commissioners dealt with that bog on the sale of the estate.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have made no arrangements in reference to the allotment of the bog on this estate, which is being sold by the owner to the tenants.

Reinstatement of Francis McGuinness on the Tottenham Estate, Co. Leitrim.

MR. F. MEEHAN (Leitrim, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have taken any steps to reinstate Francis McGuinness, of Bundoran, an evicted tenant on the Tottenham estate, Kiltyclogher, County Leitrim; and, if not, will he say why no action has been taken.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they are unable to take any action in reference to McGuinness's application regarding the two plots at one time occupied by him on this estate, as they are not holdings to which the Land Law Acts apply.

Sale of the Estate of Fleetwood Rynd, County Kildare.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the estate of Fleetwood Rynd and others in the County Kildare was offered for sale in the Land Judge's Court on the 18th instant, and that various prices were bid for lots of the same by occupiers who hold the said lands on the eleven-months system; whether it was stated that the Land Commission had agreed to advance certain sums towards the purchase amounts; whether the holders of the said lands are all graziers; and whether he will take steps to secure that the moneys of the Land Commission should not be used to purchase farms for the grazier class of holders at a time when land is needed for the settlement of cultivators, evicted tenants, and migrants.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I am informed that this estate was offered for sale by public auction in the Land Judge's Court on the 18th instant. Only one lot was sold, and the names of the bidders for the other lots are not known. Four of the lots had been the subject of proceedings under Section 40 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896. In pursuance of orders made by the Land Judge under that section, the Land Commission some time ago communicated to the tenants offers for the sale to them of their holdings, the purchase money to consist partly of cash and partly of advances to be made by the Land Commission. These offers were not accepted, and were only mentioned at the auction to show the inadequacy of the prices then bid. The lands in question are held on Court lettings for seven years, and are mainly used for grazing. As there is no present intention of making an advance for the purchase of these holdings the concluding paragraph of the Question does not appear to call for a reply.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Royal Naval Engineer Officers.

MR. BRAMSDON (Portsmouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the question of the status of the present Royal Naval engineer officers has been brought before the consideration of their Lordships, as promised by the late Secretary to the Admiralty; if so, whether any decision has yet been arrived at as to the granting of military rank and departmental control asked for to the officers referred to; and, if not, what is the present position of the matter.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. McKenna, Monmouthshire, N.): The Admiralty are giving the question of the status of the present engineer officers due attention. It has been decided to take no action for the present. My hon. friend will agree with me that the question is one of considerable complication.

MR. BRAMSDON: Was not a promise given by the late Secretary to the Admiralty as far back as March last?

MR. McKENNA: I will look into that.

MR. BRAMSDON: When is a settlement likely to be arrived at?

MR. McKENNA: I cannot name a date. The matter is a very difficult one, and the Admiralty have decided to take no action for the present.

Admiralty Contracts with Foreign Firms.

EARL OF RONALDSHAY (Middlesex, Hornsey): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what recovery the Admiralty have in the event of a foreign firm with whom a contract for timber is entered into failing to ship their contract.

MR. McKENNA: Failure to ship would only involve a question of recovery if purchase in default had to be made when the market was less favourable. If a loss occurred, the Admiralty would have to consider on the merits of the case whether or not to pursue its legal remedy.

EARL OF RONALDSHAY: What remedy is there as against a foreign firm?

MR. McKENNA: Precisely the same as in the case of a home firm—recovery by due process of law.

H.M.S. "Gladiator."

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what is the reserve price at which the "Gladiator" is to be sold; what has been the total cost of salving her, including maintenance and patching up to probable date of sale; and whether she will occupy a dock up to the date of sale or be berthed elsewhere.

MR. McKENNA: It would obviously be undesirable to publish a reserve price for any ship put up for sale. It is not possible at the present time to give the total cost of salving the "Gladiator." She will probably occupy a dock until the middle of December, and will then be berthed elsewhere.

MR. MYER (Lambeth, N.) asked whether any undertaking would be given that the vessel should be broken up in dock, thereby giving employment to workmen.

MR. McKENNA: I could not give any undertaking with regard to the course that will be pursued concerning a ship which at the present moment is not up for sale.

H.M.S. "Barfleur."

MR. BELLAIRS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty how many captains have successively been appointed to H.M.S. "Barfleur," and how many crews have successively manned this battleship in the period 1st March, 1907, to 1st September, 1908, or an interval of eighteen months.

MR. McKENNA: The "Barfleur" became a special service vessel on 5th March, 1907. There were four changes of captains. As the divisional ship, Captain Hoskyns was appointed to her in command of the special service ships at Portsmouth. Captain Hoskyns retired from the service on 15th September, 1907, and was temporarily succeeded by Captain Tothill until the death of Captain Grant on 1st October. Captain Hibbert succeeded on 1st June, 1908. The "Barfleur" was transferred March, 1907, and since then has been manned by a special crew of about seventy men.

MR. BELLAIRS: Am I to understand that since the first appointment eighteen months has been only one crew, and never been changed?

MR. McKENNA: No, Sir. I stated clearly that the ship was a special service vessel in 1907. The crew in her on that date was transferred off, and a special service crew was shipped. That remains on her.

Isle of Wight Coast.

MR. GODFREY BARI (Wight): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he

His Majesty's coastguard at Foreland, Bembridge, Isle of Wight, assist in the saving of life from shipwreck by watching the coast for wrecks, by assisting to launch the lifeboat, and by furnishing part of the crew of the lifeboat; whether His Majesty's coastguard at this place have actually performed valuable service in the saving of life on several occasions in recent years; and whether an order has been issued by the Admiralty to close this station immediately.

MR. McKENNA: The answer to the first two parts of the Question is in the affirmative. The detachment, at which there are three men, is being closed to-day, but three coastguards will continue to reside at Foreland for duty at Culver Cliff signal-station.

MR. GODFREY BARING: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in March last the Secretary to the Admiralty gave an undertaking that no further coastguard station should be closed without the House having an opportunity of considering the matter?

MR. McKENNA: I will look up that point. I do not remember the precise words used, but I would remind the hon. Member that in this case the three coastguardsmen will remain in the same place.

MR. GODFREY BARING: Will they continue to perform the life-saving duties they have hitherto done?

MR. McKENNA: Yes, if they choose to volunteer for them.

MR. SOARES (Devonshire, Barnstaple) was understood to ask who would perform the duty of watching the coast.

MR. McKENNA: That is to be undertaken in future by the Customs Service.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): How can three men man a lifeboat?

MR. McKENNA: There never were at the station more than three men at a time. They were at liberty to volunteer in assisting to man the lifeboat, and they will continue to be at liberty in the future. There has been no change in that respect.

MR. SOARES: And until the duty of watching the coast is taken over by the Customs will the coastguard do it?

MR. McKENNA: The same duties will be performed by the three men at Culver Cliff station as were performed by the coastguard at Foreland.

Government Proposals for Indian Reforms.

DR. RUTHERFORD (Middlesex, Brentford): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that the Secretary of State for India will make a statement in the House of Lords, on or about 14th December, regarding Indian reforms, he will give this House a portion of a day after the above statement has been made in order that this House may discharge its duty in this grave crisis of the history of our Indian Empire.

The following Questions were answered at the same time—

MR. O'GRADY (Leeds, E.): To ask the Prime Minister whether facilities will be afforded for the discussion of Indian reforms during this session.

MR. G. A. HARDY (Suffolk, Stowmarket): To ask the Prime Minister whether, in justice to this House, he will afford an opportunity to consider the proposals regarding reform in India during this session.

MR. MACKARNES (Berkshire, Newbury): To ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the interest aroused by the existing condition of affairs in India, he will allow a statement to be made at the earliest practicable date to this House as to the remedial measures which are contemplated by the Government of India.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): I understand that in consequence of the necessity of preliminary communication to the Government of India, my noble friend will not be able to make his statement before the 14th. As soon as the statement is made, Papers giving full information in regard to the matters concerned will be presented and circulated to Members of both Houses. These Papers, which, as I understand, are considerable, will deserve and will doubtless receive from Members interested in India, careful and deliberate examination. A short Bill will be needed, but it will probably not be introduced during the present session. I quite agree with my hon. friends as to the necessity of this House being put in possession at the earliest possible moment of the fullest information, as in fact it will be, by the immediate presentation of the Papers; but in all the circumstances, it appears to me that discussion may be advantageously postponed until there has been time for full consideration of the Papers, and until the Bill comes before us, as I hope it may in the early part of next session.

MR. MACKARNESS: May I ask whether there is any precedent for a statement of the gravity of that which is to be made by the Secretary of State being made elsewhere than in this House, without a simultaneous statement being made at the same time to the House of Commons?

MR. ASQUITH: I should not like to say at the moment whether there is any precedent, but I think it is natural for the Minister in charge of the Department to make a statement in whatever House he happens to sit in. But whatever inconvenience might otherwise be caused will, I think, be obviated by the circulation of the Papers, giving the fullest possible information.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Will the Bill be introduced in the other House or in this House?

MR. ASQUITH: I will not give any definite pledge as regards that. It will not be proceeded with till next session.

DR. RUTHERFORD: May I ask whether the East India Loan Bill will be introduced this session, and whether we shall then have an opportunity of discussing the Papers?

MR. ASQUITH: It is on the Paper. I do not know whether, or how far, these matters will be relevant to the discussion of that Bill.

MR. MACKARNESS: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his Answer means that there will be no opportunity during this session for the discussion of the Papers in this House?

MR. ASQUITH: So far as I can at present foresee, I do not think there will, nor do I think that it is at present in the public interest that there should be.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil): May I ask whether the last reply of the Prime Minister means that this House is less capable of discussing Indian affairs than the other House?

MR. ASQUITH: I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows I do not mean that. On the contrary, I think this House is a proper and natural place for the discussion of all affairs. I can assure the hon. Gentleman—and I think the House will agree with me—that I am most jealous that this House should not be in a prejudicial position as compared with the other branch of the Legislature in regard to this or any other question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Then translate that into action.

Outrages in India.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he can give the House any information regarding the attempt to assassinate Mr. Hume, public prosecutor, on the Eastern Bengal Railway, and the murder of Mr. Clough, district superintendent of police at Lyallpur.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. BUCHANAN, Perthshire, E.): A bomb was thrown at a train, in which Mr. Hume is stated to have been travelling, on the evening of 24th November. No damage was done. There is no clue to the perpetrator of the outrage. The Government of India reported that Mr. Clough's murder by a police sowar was an act of private revenge and in no way due to political motives.

Malarial Fever in India.

*MR. REES: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether malarial fever prevails to an abnormal extent in Upper India and parts of Bengal and Bombay; and, if so, whether special steps are being taken by the Government of India to combat this exceptionally severe epidemic.

MR. BUCHANAN: Malarial fever has been exceptionally prevalent in the United Provinces and the Punjab, and to a less extent in Bombay, and has affected both the European and Indian population. The epidemic began in October last and a telegram received this morning reports it to be rapidly declining. To combat the disease quinine has been largely distributed free of charge, travelling dispensaries have been established, and in places much attention has been paid to the destruction of mosquitoes. The causation of the disease is under investigation by a specially trained medical staff.

Circulation of Seditious Literature in India.

*MR. REES: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that seditious literature habitually reaches India from France, whence prohibited newspapers and pamphlets are sent to French-Indian settlements, from which they are secretly distributed in British India; and whether, in view of the friendly entente between Great Britain and France, and of the fact that Bengal anarchists have committed crime in French possessions also in India, he will consider the propriety of approaching the French Government in view of getting this stream of sedition stemmed.

MR. BUCHANAN: The Secretary of State has the subject under consideration.

House Accommodation in Calcutta.

*MR. REES: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State will inquire into the accommodation available in Calcutta for officers whose duty requires them to provide themselves with such accommodation during the period which the Government of India spends at that city; and, if accommodation is not available at prices such as officers can afford to pay, whether he will take any, and, if so, what, steps to provide such accommodation.

MR. BUCHANAN: An inquiry was recently instituted by the Government of India into the question of house accommodation for Government officers stationed at Calcutta. As a result of that inquiry, the Government of India recommended, and the Secretary of State sanctioned, two years ago, a scheme for building quarters and for extending the grants made of house-rent allowances. He has received no information from the Government of India leading him to suppose that any further inquiry is necessary at present.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: Can the hon. Gentleman say for what period of the year is the Government of India stationed at Calcutta?

MR. BUCHANAN: From the middle of the autumn to the beginning of the following year.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: Four months.

*MR. REES: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that during those four months the expense of living at Calcutta is so great that officers otherwise desirable are sometimes unable to accept appointments of this character?

MR. BUCHANAN: No doubt the expense of living at Calcutta is very heavy.

Famine in the United Provinces of India.

*MR. REES: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the failure of crops in 1907 in the United Provinces resulted in widespread application therein of the Prevention of Famine Code; whether the death rate during the period of scarcity rose far higher than in ordinary years; whether epidemic disease prevailed to the same extent as during former periods of scarcity and crop failure; and whether many deaths occurred that can rightly be attributed to starvation.

MR. BUCHANAN : The Answer to the first Question is in the affirmative. The death rate was very slightly in excess to that for the preceding three years, namely, 36·47, as compared with 35·95 in the lowest of these years. Cholera and other epidemic diseases were, as in similar seasons of scarcity, more than usually prevalent. Much greater care was taken in regard to medical and sanitary administration. Children and infants came with their parents to the works, and were there carefully fed. Emaciated persons were medically treated and only eleven deaths were attributable to want of food. The Secretary of State proposes shortly to lay on the Table the Report of the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces.

MR. KEIR HARDIE asked whether the hon. Gentleman would recommend to the Government that similar steps should be taken at home.

MR. BUCHANAN : That is rather outside my province, but I think that the Government of India have shown a good example.

MR. R. HARCOURT (Montrose Burghs): Will these Reports be confined to the United Provinces, or will they deal with other parts of India? My hon. friend informed me recently that the whole question was under consideration.

MR. BUCHANAN : The most important and interesting Report is that of the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces.

British Vice-Consuls in the Congo State.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can inform the House if any steps have been taken towards increasing the number of British Vice-Consuls in the Congo State; and if His Majesty's Consular staff can be provided with means of conveyance on the Upper Congo and its affluents.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): I am taking measures to constitute the Vice-Consulate in the Katango district a permanent instead of a temporary post; to create a new Vice-Consular post in the Kasal district; and to provide a steamer on the Upper Congo to assist His Majesty's Consular officers in their official tours.

Gun Running into Afghanistan.

MR. REES : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, last month, Afghan gun-runners, smuggling arms from Persia into Afghanistan, surrendered to a band of Persian robbers who, in turn, surrendered to the Nushki Bey; and whether the Persian Government is taking steps to prevent a practice fraught with such danger to British troops and British interests in India.

SIR EDWARD GREY : His Majesty's Government have received no report on the incident referred to in the first part of the Question. In regard to the second part of the Question, I can add nothing to the Reply given to the hon. Member on the 14th ultimo on this subject, to the effect that His Majesty's Government did not fail to keep the importance of the question before the Persian authorities and that the latter were doing what they could to deal with it.

Pension Claimants.

MR. ELLIS DAVIES (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that certain newspapers are publishing lists of persons whose claims to pensions have been admitted under the Old-Age Pensions Act and whether he will communicate with the pension officers with a view to stopping the practice.

THE TREASURER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Sir EDWARD STRACHEY, Somersetshire, S.; for Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE): I may refer my hon. friend to the reply which my right hon. friend gave to a Question on this subject by the hon. Member for the Barnard Castle Division on the 19th ultimo. My right hon. friend has no reason to suppose that information in these cases has been given by pension officers, who have instructions to treat the names both of claimants and of pensioners as confidential. In cases in which the names of pensioners have been communicated to the Press, he believes the communication has been made through the local pension committee, who are free under the Act and Regulations to exercise their own discretion in the matter. He has already expressed the view that this practice is for many reasons undesirable, and hopes that pension committees will as a rule treat all applications as confidential.

Mine Timber.

MR. ELLIS DAVIES: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the statement of Mr. Henry Hall, inspector of mines, to the effect that Welsh larch is less liable to spontaneous combustion than foreign timber; and whether any and, if so, what steps have been taken to bring this information to the knowledge of those engaged in coal mining.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): I have seen the Paper to which my hon. friend refers. The experiments made upon the inflammability of various sorts of wood are interesting, but not on a scale extensive enough to warrant the conclusion suggested in the Question. The Paper has been published by the Institution of Mining Engineers, and will no doubt come to the notice of those engaged in the industry in the ordinary course.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): Is there any instance in which spontaneous combustion has been traced to the use of foreign timber: and would the supply of Welsh larch be in any degree adequate to the demand for the Welsh collieries alone?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not prepared to go into that.

*MR. REES: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the propriety of holding a more extensive investigation into this subject in view of the importance of the matter to the Welsh counties?

MR. GLADSTONE'S reply was inaudible.

White Phosphorus.

EARL OF RONALDSHAY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many manufacturers in this country employ white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches; and how many cases of necrosis there have been in each such factory in each of the last five years.

MR. GLADSTONE: There are ten firms using white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches. One firm has had five cases of necrosis during the last five years; the other firms have had none. This result has only been attained by means of an elaborate and costly system of regulation. Moreover, as intimated in the Memorandum prefixed to the Bill now before the House, recent events have shown that the existing regulations are insufficient to remove entirely the risk of necrosis, and that even more stringent regulations would be required if the use of white phosphorus were to be continued.

Dove Petty Sessions—Alleged Parental Neglect.

MR. BELLOC (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the sentence of three months' hard labour passed at the Dove Petty Sessions, in Herefordshire, upon one Barber for the neglect of his five children; whether he is aware that the case was put forward by a man employed and paid by private persons to promote such prosecutions, that Barber was at work seventy hours a week on a wage of 20s., had recently lost his wife, and was by various circumstances prevented from doing more for his children; and whether, seeing that the evidence showed that the children were well fed and healthy, he will say what steps he intends to take in the matter.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am making inquiry with regard to this case, and I will let the hon. Member know the result.

Building Accidents in Oxford Street.

MR. W. T. WILSON (Lancashire, Westhoughton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state how many fatal and non-fatal accidents have happened on the premises now in course of construction in Oxford Street, W.C., by the Waring-White Building Company, from the commencement of the work to the present time.

MR. GLADSTONE: During the period mentioned, a little over eighteen months in length, three fatal and forty-five non-fatal accidents have been reported. All the fatal and most of the non-fatal accidents were due either to the worker falling or to his being struck by something falling. As the hon. Member is aware, a Bill is now before the House to enable me to make regulations for the prevention of accidents in building operations.

Commission on Meat Trusts.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will state how often the Committee on Meat Trusts has met up to this date; and when he expects to receive the Report.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. CHURCHILL, Dundee): I am informed that the Departmental Committee on Combinations in the Meat Trade has held eleven meetings for the taking of evidence. I understand that Old-Age Pensions Regulations.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, in regard to the granting of old-age pensions, if he can state whether a woman whose husband is in receipt of relief would be rendered ineligible for a pension simply because she benefits by the relief, or whether the husband would be regarded as the sole person in receipt of relief.

MR. JOHN BURNS: If the relief given to the husband was given wholly or partly for or on account of the wife she would be ineligible for a pension.

MR. BLACK (Bedfordshire, Biggleswade): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if a married woman, who has hitherto maintained herself by her own labour, would be debarred from a pension if her husband had been in receipt of parish relief to the extent of 3s. per week; and whether a woman in these circumstances is held to participate in the poor relief which is granted to her husband.

MR. JOHN BURNS: If the relief was given to the husband solely for his own support it would not disqualify the wife, but if it was given to him wholly or partly for the support of his wife she would be disqualified.

MR. ROGERS (Wiltshire, Devizes): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the officials at Somerset House put a contrary interpretation upon this?

MR. JOHN BURNS: That may be, but I think it safe for me to give the House the opinions supplied by the Law Officers of the Crown after mature consideration.

MR. ROGERS: Does the right hon. Gentleman realise the extraordinary difficulty in which pension committees are placed when the Commissioners give one interpretation and the Local Government Board another?

MR. JOHN BURNS said he would consult with the Chancellor of the Exchequer to see whether members of the pension committees could not be supplied with a short Memorandum embodying the definitions that had been given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and himself.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): Could the relief given to a husband when living with his wife be treated as relief given to the husband alone, or would this decision only apply where the man and woman lived apart?

MR. JOHN BURNS: It depends wholly on the circumstances of each case. My noble friend will excuse me if I decline to go beyond the Answer I have given.

MR. JOYCE (Limerick): Will the right hon. Gentleman supply the information in the form of a Return to Parliament?

MR. JOHN BURNS: Yes, Sir.

Mitcham Common Improvement.

MR. GEORGE ROBERTS (Norwich): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is prepared to make a grant from the central fund to the Croydon Distress Committee in respect of the scheme of improvements on Mitcham Common.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I have been in communication with the Croydon Distress Committee on this subject, and as a result of representations from them I have decided to make a payment of £200 out of the Parliamentary grant towards the work on Mitcham Common.

MR. DOBSON (Plymouth): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the guardians might be more effectually helped in dealing with the distress if he gave assistance for the widening of Addiscombe Road rather than for the improvement of Mitcham Common?

MR. JOHN BURNS: Yes; and I have shown my sympathy to the extent of granting £1,000 for that work.

Lynn Corporation Farm.

MR. GEORGE ROBERTS: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has caused inquiry to be made into the proposal of the King's Lynn Town Council to sell the corporation farm of 763 acres at Snettisham; and whether, before reaching a decision, he will consider the advisability of the land being retained, especially in view of the demand for agricultural land under the Small Holdings and Allotments Act, 1907.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I have caused inquiry to be made on this subject, and the question whether the land should be retained or sold is now under my consideration. I may say, however, that I am advised that the land is not suited for the purpose of small holdings.

City of London Auxiliary Postmen.

MR. W. T. WILSON (Lancashire, Westhoughton): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that, although the auxiliary postmen employed on the last delivery in the City of London signed in July last a notification of their increase of pay of 9d. per week, they have not yet received this increase; and whether he will give instructions that these men be paid the increase they are entitled to.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Town Hamlets, Poplar): The amounts were paid in full last week.

Supply of Baskets for the Post Office.

MR. WATT: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General what was the sum spent on baskets for his Department for use in Scotland; and how much of that sum was placed with Scottish firms with their places of business in Scotland.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The number of baskets required specifically for use in Scotland is very small, only 100 have been asked for this year; and these can be supplied from the general stock. For the general order no tenders were received from any firm in Scotland. Three charitable institutions in Scotland tendered, and I hope I may be able to give an order for trays to one of them.

Single-Room Schools and the Right of Entry.

MR. MILD MAY (Devonshire, Totnes): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether, under Clause 2 of the Elementary Education Bill, it is intended to provide for the right of entry in single-room schools in the country districts.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. TREVELYAN, Yorkshire, W.R., Eiland): Yes, Sir, if it is administratively practicable. I do not think it is possible to lay down a hard and fast rule, applicable to all single-room schools; but large numbers of these schools are already provided with partitions, screens or other means of separating classes, or are otherwise suitable for the conduct of two or more classes.

MR. ASHLEY: How is the right of entry to be effected in such cases?

MR. TREVELYAN asked for notice.

Foot-and-Mouth Disease in America.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if he will state from what source he has received information as to foot-and-mouth disease existing in America; when did the outbreak occur and when was he advised of it; what area is the disease confined to, and will he state the extent of the area affected by the prohibition; are the precautions taken against this disease with regard to America similar to those applied in Great Britain and Ireland; and are any special precautions being taken against the landing of Canadian cattle in view of the prevalence of foot-and-and Delaware is prohibited. The regulations of the United States of America normally require imported cattle—except those for immediate slaughter—to be quarantined for sixty days if imported from the United Kingdom, for ninety days if imported from any other country. As regards Canada, however, less stringent requirements obtain. These precautions are not, of course, similar to those in force in Great Britain and Ireland, as the regulations of the former only admit cattle from non-prohibited countries for slaughter at the port of landing, whilst there is no trade in foreign cattle to Ireland. The Board have not themselves adopted any additional precautions against the landing from Canada of cattle for slaughter, as the Dominion Government have taken the most stringent measures to safeguard their herds from the introduction of disease from the United States and have also prohibited the export of their cattle from ports in the United States and the use of their ports by cattle vessels which have been in such ports.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.): Will the hon. Gentleman give us an assurance that cattle from the infected ports in America are not shipped to this country via Boston?

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY: We are satisfied with the precautions which are being taken.

MR. COOPER (Southwark, Bermondsey): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he will give the number of cattle landed at Deptford and Birkenhead cattle markets for immediate slaughter, for the weeks ending 18th and 25th November; whether these cattle were imported from Canada or the United States; whether, as cattle are allowed to be imported from the States of the United States which have no cattle disease, he will allow the importation of cattle for immediate slaughter from European countries officially declared free from cattle disease; and, if not, will he state his reason.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY: The number of cattle landed at Deptford, for the weeks ending 18th and 25th November, from the United States ports was 2,227 and 2,028, and from Canadian ports, 2,939 and 1,256, respectively. The number landed at Birkenhead during the same periods from the United States ports was 1,225 and 3,264, and from Canadian ports 1,169 and 1,236. The Board's action in maintaining the prohibition of importation of animals from Europe is based on the considerations indicated in Section 25 of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, under which questions other than that of the sanitary conditions of animals must be taken into account.

MR. WATT: Why does the Department discriminate between States in America and not in Europe?

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY: Because in America the States are under one Central Government. In Europe they are under separate Governments.

MR. COOPER: Why not allow importation from the Argentine?

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY: For the very good reason we are not satisfied that the precautions taken there are adequate.

Small Holdings—Defaulting Councils.

MR. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, seeing that the Small Holdings Act came into operation on 1st January last in all counties alike, and while working beneficially in some counties is being nullified in others, whether the Board has due regard to the hardship inflicted on the people in the latter counties whom the Act was intended to benefit; whether he will lay upon the Table the latest communication addressed by the Board to the defaulting councils on the subject of their default; and whether the Board will forthwith address a mandatory communication to defaulting councils in whose counties there is a demand for small holdings, or would be a demand if land were acquired, and fix 31st December, 1908, as the latest date before which those councils must take action bona fide for the purposes of the Act.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY: The Board do not think any useful purpose would be served at present by adopting the hon. Member's suggestions.

Small Holdings in Hampshire.

MR. R. HARCOURT: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somersetshire, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether the Hampshire County Council have furnished any report as to the applications for small holdings, amounting to some 5,000 acres, refused by them; and, if not, whether it is proposed to call for one.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY: The reply is in the negative. We do not propose to ask for the reasons for rejection unless we are appealed to by the applicants themselves.

MR. R. HARCOURT: Do I understand that the Board do not propose to take the initiative in informing unsuccessful applicants that they have a power of appeal?

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY said the Board naturally did not inform every applicant of the rejection of their applications by the county council, because they were not aware of the rejection unless there was an appeal to the Board.

MR. MONTAGU (Cambridgeshire, Cherterton) inquired whether the hon. Gentleman had received any complaints.

Mr. W. ROBSON: I should not like answer very positively off-hand, but myself do not know of any. My rned predecessor may perhaps have used in some cases.

Outdoor Relief in Scotland.

Mr. BARNES (Glasgow, Blackfriars): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland any instructions have been issued by Local Government Board to parish councils in Scotland forbidding the payment of outdoor relief up to 5s. per week.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): The Board have issued no such instructions. The facts are these. The Board have been asked by several parish councils whether, in view of the Old-Age Pensions Act, they would be justified in increasing the payment of all poor persons above seventy years of age to 5s. per week; and they have answered that parish councils would not be warranted in so raising the allowance, but must be guided solely by the needs of the paupers without reference to the Old-Age Pensions Act.

Glasgow Young Men's Christian Association Classes.

Mr. WATT: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that evening classes have for years been carried on by the Young Men's Christian Association at Glasgow, that these classes have met a felt want of the community there, and that they have earned in grants from £250 to £300 per annum; so, will he say how this institution is to be dealt with under the Education (Scotland) Bill; and, if no provision has been made for it and similar institutions, will he see that such is introduced in another place.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am aware that the classes in question have been carried on as stated, and that they have been in receipt of considerable grants from the Department. Nothing in the Bill deprives the managers of the power or opportunity to earn these grants in the future as in the past, and there is no occasion for making any special provision regarding this and similar institutions in the Bill.

Poyntzpass Sewerage.

MR. McKILLOP (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether rate-payers of Poyntzpass, County Armagh, have sent two petitions to the Local Government Board for Ireland praying that a sworn inquiry might be held by them into the defective sewerage of the village; and whether, seeing that both the local sanitary officer and the Local Government inspector have reported upon and condemned the system so far back as 1904, and that there has, in fact, been an outbreak of scarlatina in the district, he will take any steps to secure an inquiry into the matter with a view to a remedy being applied.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): The facts, speaking generally, are as stated in the Question. The representations made to the Local Government Board did not, however, comply with the requirements of Section 15 of the Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1896, and the Board were, therefore, unable to take action on them. The requirements of the section have been explained to the petitioners, who have, however, taken no further action.

Countess of Charlemont's Armagh Estate.

MR. McKILLOP: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what is the present position of the negotiations with regard to the proposed sale of the Countess of Charlemont's estate, County Armagh; whether any application has been made by the tenants to the Estates Commissioners for inspection; whether pressure has been brought to bear on the tenants to enter on agreements which they consider unfair; whether a memorial on behalf of the tenants was presented to the Estates Commissioners, and whether any reply was made to it; and what action, if any, the Estates Commissioners proposed to take to safeguard the interests of the tenants affected.

BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners have referred the papers to this estate to their inspector. He has completed his inspection and made his report, the Commissioners cannot express any opinion as to their future action in the matter.

Irish Land Purchase.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the practice of the Irish Land Commission in cases in which a vendor induces a tenant, as a condition of allowing him to purchase, to give a mortgage at high interest on his holding, and the so-called purchaser breaks down under the double load of annuity and interest and is evicted; do they offer such a person any redress; do they hold the vendor, when in the jurisdiction of Irish Courts, to any extent responsible; and what steps, if any, do they take to prevent such transactions.

MR. BIRRELL: So far as the Land Commission are aware no case of the kind has ever arisen on the sale of a holding for default. The disposal of the proceeds of such a sale is regulated by statute, and the question of redress cannot therefore arise. If any such transaction were brought to the notice of the Estates Commissioners, prior to the completion of a sale under the Land Purchase Acts, they would fully investigate it and, if unfair dealing were proved, would refuse to sanction the sale.

Chapman Estate, Westmeath.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have yet had an inspection made of the Chapman Estate, Killna, Westmeath; whether they have ascertained that it comprises uneconomic holdings and evicted land suitable for relieving congestion; whether they are aware that the delay in sale is caused by attempts of the vendor to use up the evicted land by enlarging a demesne already ample and creating new tenancies in favour of graziers; and whether they will allow the intentions of Parliament to be defeated in this manner, or will intervene now in time by intimating their purpose not to decide the question to be an estate of their entirety to the disposal as the necessities of the estate and district demand.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners will deal with this estate in its order of priority. Its turn will not come for some time, and meanwhile the Commissioners cannot express any opinion as to their future action.

Limerick Labourers' Cottages.

Mr. JOYCE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether an inquiry has been lately held in Limerick as to the claims made for cottages by the labourers of Singland and Blackboy Pike; and, if tended to applicant was in the nature of provisional or medical relief given by the relieving officer in kind by the order of the medical officer, and that upon further consideration of the case the pensions officer himself declared that this was a case for a pension; and whether, in view of all the circumstances, he will request the Local Government Board to reopen the matter with a view to considering the further evidence obtained in regard to it.

Mr. BIRRELL: The reply to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative. Before deciding the appeal the Local Government Board satisfied themselves period thirty-five schools for girls have been amalgamated with neighbouring schools for boys, so as to form mixed schools. In these cases the old buildings are still available as class-rooms or for other schools purposes. The Commissioners are prepared to investigate any cases of alleged hardship in connection with the closing or amalgamation of schools if supplied with particulars. Their rules prescribe twenty pupils as the minimum attendance warranting grants. This number may be composed of boys and girls, or of either sex exclusively. An exception is made in cases where religious minorities have not the means of instruction within a reasonable distance of their homes. The Board of Works inform me that no national schools have been built under the supervision of their architects. Where a school is being erected by the aid of a Government grant or loan, the Board's architects occasionally inspect the building to see that the instalments of the grants or loan have been earned, but the responsibility for the work rests with the managers of the school.

Food Analysis in County Cavan.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will say whether any samples were submitted to the public analyst under the Food and Drugs Act during the year 1907 from County Cavan, and, if so, how many distinguishing between liquid and solid; and is the work of analysis entirely performed by the public analyst whose signature is appended to the certificates given in evidence in prosecutions under the Food and Drugs Act in County Cavan.

MR. BIRRELL: It appears from the Reports made to the local authority by the public analyst that 680 samples were submitted from County Cavan to the analyst in 1907. The samples consisted of 383 articles of food, of which 176 were solid and 207 liquid, and 297 drugs. I have no information as to the arrangements made by the analyst for the discharge of his duties.

Cashel Disturbances.

MR. CONDON (Tipperary, E.): I to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on Tuesday last, on the occasion of the trial of eight respectable young men at Cashel the police under the command of County Inspector Rogers charged the people in the streets with batons, knocking down men, women, and children, indiscriminately, striking some of them while on the ground, batoned one old woman who tried to protect a man from their violence, and that at night the police paraded the streets of Cashel, burst into several houses, and batoned the inmates; whether the police arrested a number of people who were returning from a dramatic entertainment held in the town hall; and whether County Inspector Rogers is the same police officer who ill-treated the people at the Watergrass Hill, County Cork, evictions, and who subsequently corroborated the version of the explosion at Glenaherry given by Lord Ashtown as against the sworn evidence of Captain Loyd (Home Office expert), the evidence of the local police, and the district inspector who was specially told off to inquire into the Glenaherry explosion.

MR. BIRRELL: On Monday, 23rd November last, at Cashel eight men were returned for trial without bail upon a charge of riot and unlawful assembly at Holycross. After the hearing, a crowd of 600 or 700 persons, which had assembled, attacked the police with stones, severely injuring a district-inspector and two constables and striking others. The stone-throwing continued until the crowd had been dispersed by repeated baton charges. In the evening the rioting was resumed, and a determined attack was made on the police barracks. Further baton charges were necessary to disperse the rioters. I am informed by the county inspector that it is absolutely untrue, so far as his knowledge goes, that women and children were knocked down by the police in the baton-charges, or that either women or children were struck. Several of the offenders were arrested, and are awaiting trial at Assizes. The whole matter will therefore be the subject of judicial investigation. County-Inspector Rogers was in charge of the police in the earlier part of the day, and District Inspector Hardy was in charge in the evening. County Inspector Rogers is the officer who dispersed a mob at Riverstown, County Cork, four years ago, shortly after the Watergrass Hill evictions. His conduct on that occasion was highly commended by the Judge who tried a civil action arising out of the matter. He also gave evidence in connection with the Glenaherry explosion.

MR. SHEEHY (Meath, S.): Was the information the right hon. Gentleman has just given supplied by Rogers himself?

MR. BIRRELL: No, it has been supplied in answer to a question of my own which I addressed to the Inspector-General. No doubt Rogers had a concern in making the answer. Who else could give better evidence of what occurred in a transaction in which he had a part?

MR. BELLOC: Has the right hon. Gentleman got information from the popular side as well as from the police side? Are there no witnesses on the popular side?

MR. BIRRELL: Well, really, I am asked a Question relating to a collision between the police and what the hon. Member calls the popular side, and Questions are put to me as to the conduct of the police on that occasion, and I naturally inquire from the police what their conduct was.

MR. BELLOC: Why? Is there really no machinery in this part of Western Europe for finding out both sides to a question? It is amazing — perfectly amazing.

Ely Estate, Wexford.

MR. FFRENCH (Wexford, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the purchase agreements with reference to the Ely estate, County Wexford, were lodged with the Estates Commissioners in July, 1906, and that nothing more has since been done; and can he say if there is yet any prospect of the inspection taking place and the sale being carried out.

MR. BIRRELL: The purchase agreements in this case were lodged on the date mentioned and the estate will be dealt with in its turn. Having regard to the large number of estates in respect of which purchase agreements were lodged on earlier dates, the Estates Commissioners are not in a position to say when the estate will be inspected.

Newbawn Evicted Tenant.

MR. FFRENCH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mrs. Ellen Egan, now residing at Newbawn, Wexford, was evicted from her farm of sixty acres on the Leigh estate, Rosegarland, in 1888; whether all the particulars are in the hands of the Estates Commissioners; and if they will take any action to bring about a settlement between her and those in occupation, who would be likely to give up the land for a small sum of money.

MR. BIRRELL: Mrs. Egan's application was not received within the time specified in the Evicted Tenants Act, but will be inquired into when the Leigh Estate is being dealt with under the Irish Land Act, 1903.

Colonel Gascoigne's Tenantry.

MR. LUNDON (Limerick, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that about ten days since in the town of Kilfinane, County Limerick, the bailiff of Colonel Gascoigne served writs for possession on several of his town tenants, there being no rent of any account due, but merely as the result of a request on the part of the tenants to have their rents reduced; did Fenton the bailiff serve those writs with revolver in hand; was he accompanied by members of the constabulary force, and, if so, by whose orders; and will the Executive Government on such occasions utilise the police in the early stages of the proceedings to recover possession of houses from people many of whom are in poverty.

MR. BIRRELL: Proceedings are pending for assaults in connection with this matter, and it is not therefore desirable to make any statement on the subject.

Broughal Evicted Tenant.

MR. REDDY (King's County, Birr): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Estates Commissioners gave notice in the Gazette in June last that they intend to acquire compulsorily the farm from which Rody Dooley, Broughal, King's County, was evicted; and will he say when Dooley may hope to be reinstated.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners inform me that the owner is prepared to accept the price estimated by them for this farm, and they hope that the evicted tenant will be reinstated at an early date.

Government Boards

MR. T. F. RICHARDS (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that the Board of Agriculture has never met; whether the business of that body is left entirely to permanent officials, an unelected body; and whether he could see his way to dissolve the present Board and to reconstruct another, composed of not less than fifteen members and drawn from all parties represented in this House, all of whom shall be unpaid, and whose duties shall be to assist the Minister of Agriculture and who shall meet not less than once per week.

MR. ASQUITH: It is the fact that this Board has never met. I believe the same thing may be said of the Board of Trade and the Local Government Board.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: And the Treasury Board.

MR. ASQUITH: No.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: It only meets once a year.

MR. ASQUITH: The political head of the Department for the time being is responsible to Parliament for all its proceedings. I do not think that the arrangement suggested by the hon. Gentleman would tend to administrative efficiency.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to, Liverpool Corporation (Streets and Buildings) Bill, with Amendments.

EL EMENTARY EDUCATION (ENGLAND AND WALES) (No. 2) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. EMMOTT (Oldham), in the Chair]

Clause 2:

*MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walton) said he put down his Amendment to leave out subsection (1) at an early stage because it was clear that the only method which one had in the short time at the disposal of the Committee for examining into the value of the concession as to the right of entry would be considerably postponed if the opportunity presented by this course was not taken advantage of. He had never belonged to the number of those who denied that, as far as the right of entry was concerned, a very real and substantial concession had been made by Nonconformists to members of the Church of England. It was clear that if the right of entry was secured in such a manner as to be really a right of effective entry into all the provided schools, a very great concession indeed was made to the Church. From what had fallen from the Prime Minister and the Minister for Education there were grounds for assuming that they intended, at least, that this right of entry should be made effective, but it was a little difficult to understand some of the qualifications which had been made upon this point by prominent Nonconformists. Dr. Clifford had said he was able to support it in so far as it was a definite approach to the ideal; the Rev. J. Scott Lidgett said that no loss of principle was involved, so long as no pressure was brought to bear either on the parents or the teachers; and Dr. Horton had said his own difficulty centred in Section 5 of Clause 2, and that everything turned on the regulations which would be made for determining the effect of the demand of the parents for denominational teaching in provided schools. Those statements appeared to suggest that those gentlemen were placing some reliance upon the regulations which were to be drafted to prevent that full and effective operation of the clause which it was the intention of the Government to see. On superficial examination the clause appeared to be drafted in a manner hardly adapted to give the facilities which the Government said they were anxious to give. If one read subsection (1), one would see it was phrased in a very curious way. It said—

“Where the parent of any child in attendance at a public elementary school provided by the local education authority desires that child to receive religious instruction of a character different from that which it is open to the local education authority to give, in accordance with subsection (2) of Section 14 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, the authority shall, for the purpose of enabling that child to receive that instruction, on two mornings in the week in which the school meets, make available any accommodation in the schoolhouse which can reasonably be so made available.”

The extent of the undertaking contained in subsection (1) was merely that whatever accommodation could reasonably be made available in the schoolhouse was to be made available, and he thought that in explicitness the clause left a great deal to be desired; and it contained several serious omissions. The system of right of entry, which was a new one, ought to have been worked out in detail, and he thought some alternative provisions such as he had on the Paper would be better adapted to secure the object of the Government. As an illustration, he would mention that Section 7 of the Act of 1902, which settled the relations of voluntary schools and local education authorities—a very analogous subject to the one at present before the Committee—was a detailed clause of the Bill, and occupied eleven days in discussion. This question of the right of entry, which was an extremely difficult one to determine and to define, contained no detailed provisions at all in the Bill. The regulations were the really important part, and in so far as the desire of the parents was dealt with in the regulations, it was, of course, directly relevant to the provisions of the subsection under discussion. Supplementing the words of the subsection by the regulations, he thought he was right in saying that the desire of the parents for special religious instruction had to be indicated six weeks before the school term began; but to anybody who had any experience of a Lancashire school, such a provision was useless. Taking the working classes in an ordinary town, it was inconceivable that in any large number of cases a written demand for a particular form of instruction should be presented six weeks before the term began; and as showing that it was not a reasonable provision he would contrast with it the regulation of the Board of Education distributing the £100,000 building grant provided under the Appropriation Act, in order that council schools might be built in single school-areas. The original Treasury estimate announced that the grant was intended to be distributed in cases where there was a strong desire of the parents for an undenominational school. One would have expected that that strong desire would have had to be indicated in a manner a little clearer than a mere desire, which was not a strong desire, but the Board's regulations in the case of the building grant only required as evidence of the strong desire a parents' petition, and none of these restrictions as to the date on which the petition must be presented. If they could show a strong desire simply by signing a petition when they were dealing with public money, it must be obvious that when they were dealing with the money of the denominationists themselves it was a provision singularly ill-calculated to elicit the real desires of the parents to make the requisitions contained in the regulations as exacting as in the present Bill. Without going into any detail at all, he ventured to criticise the manner in which this clause providing for the right of entry was drafted. He suggested to the Government that they had made the limitations the most important part of the clause, and the general declaration the least important, instead of making the general declaration the most important, and the qualification of that principle the subordinate part. He thought it was more particularly desirable that in subsection (1) it should be made clear that the instruction to be given within school hours was part of the regular curriculum and discipline of the school, but it did not appear in the present subsection. He ventured to think also that the method of eliciting the wishes of the parents ought to be identical with the method to be adopted for eliciting the wishes of those parents who wished for Cowper-Temple teaching instead of denominational teaching. It would be the clearest possible indication of good faith on the part of the Government in making the right of entry genuine if they were to provide in the clause that the method of ascertaining the wishes of the parent should be the same whether the parent desired Cowper-Temple or denominational teaching. He ventured to say that if that concession was forthcoming nearly every misunderstanding which existed at present about the right of entry would be cleared away. It would be the best possible evidence which could be given of the sincerity of the desire that denominationalists in council schools should obtain facilities for the teaching of their children. He would not be in order in discussing the terms of the alternative proposals which he had put down lower on the Paper, but he would say that he was not in any way wedded to the language in which they were drafted. If it were really the intention of the Government to make these concessions effective—and he gladly acknowledged that, from their utterances and their later correspondence with the Archbishop, it was to be assumed that they did desire that—they would certainly conciliate a great many people who were, at present, dissatisfied with the reality of the concessions by doing as he suggested.

“ In page 2, line 19, to leave out subsection (1).”—(Mr. F. E. Smith.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘Where the’ stand part of the clause.”

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) said the Prime Minister had throughout recognised the vast importance of this clause to anybody who approached the question of a settlement from the Church of England point of view, and he had repeatedly assured them that, whilst the Government in drafting these proposals intended they should give a real and effective right of entry, at the same time he was prepared to consider with an open mind any criticisms that might be brought to bear upon the clause and to amend the clause if it was necessary to secure the result which was common to the Government and to the Archbishop of Canterbury, if he might take him as representative of the great body of Church opinion. In those circumstances he hoped that in dealing with the Amendment the Government would be ready to take the House into their confidence at once and to give some general indication of the result of the further consideration which they had given to the matter. He thought that would very much facilitate their discussions and tend to preserve the non-party and sympathetic attitude that on the whole had prevailed. It must be borne in mind that there were fears on the part of those who set a real value on the right of entry. He had some knowledge of those fears, because from the first he had regarded this clause as being intended to give a real right of entry, but he had found many of his friends rather difficult to convince upon that point. What was it that they urged? If he approached a controversial subject he hoped the Committee would see that he was not doing it in a controversial manner, and that if he said what was disagreeable to some hon. Gentlemen it was not with the desire to be disagreeable, but because it was really necessary that they should know what fears they had to meet if they were to come to anything like an agreement. He started with the assumption that if the Bill passed with anything like general assent the great bulk of educational authorities throughout the country would accept it and endeavour to work it honestly, with a real desire to make it successful. But there were educational authorities in certain parts of the country who had shown such animus and bias in their treatment of the denominational schools that he found it impossible to convince many of his friends that fair treatment could possibly be expected from them. It might be replied that in that case there was the appeal to the Board of Education, and he for one believed and did not hesitate to state that the President of the Board of Education, whose Bill this was, who had promoted and nursed this attempt at a settlement, would do his best to make the settlement really effective; but many people thought that the Board of Education itself had shown in its administrative and some of its judicial functions so distinct a bias, and had adopted so party an attitude—not under the right hon. Gentleman himself, but under his immediate predecessor—that the confidence which they were prepared to place in it, as shown by the treatment of the 1906 Bill by the House of Lords, they no longer had in 1908. It was a most unfortunate thing, but it was a fact which they must recognise, that the Board of Education in 1908 had not the confidence of the present minority in the House in the sense in which it had in 1906. They could not get over what had happened in the interval. That being so, the words of the statute became, for the purposes of those who wished to assure their friends that the right of entry was really secured, of enormous importance, and not merely the words of the statute, but the words of the Regulations issued, or projected, by the Board of Education, as being the authority which would have to watch over the execution of the statute. He would like to say three things in regard to the Regulations which had been already sketched by the Board. He thought it was an unfortunate mistake, which he hoped the Government would rectify, to put in the clause to which his hon. and learned friend had already alluded, that the parent should give notice six weeks before the term began. He was sure that that was not in the least necessary for the purposes of school administration, and it was placing an obstacle in the path of the enjoyment of the right of entry which in many cases was likely to be for a time at least insuperable in regard to a great number of children. He was certain it was not necessary. The first boarding school he went to—if he might give a personal experience—consisted of members of the Unitarian body and of the Church of England in almost equal proportions. It was not necessary for their parents to give notice six weeks beforehand of the kind of instruction they desired their boys to have, any more than later, when he went to Rugby, it was necessary to say six weeks beforehand whether he desired to take natural science or German. He was asked on the first day of the term, and he was certain they could do away with this long notice, and that in itself would be a concession that would be much valued by those who really cared about the right of entry. In the second place, why should it be necessary, when a child passed from one department of the school to another, to give a fresh notice? Surely, provided the notice was given for the child when it entered the school or at any given period, that notice ought to stand in the books of the school authority and ought to apply until it was revoked. There was no necessity for troubling the parent to make a fresh declaration. These were two points arising out of the Regulations, and there was a third. He joined with his hon. and learned friend in deprecating the form attached to the instructions in which the parent was to give notice. He invited the House to consider what this form would convey to the ordinary parent. He got a form in which he had to say that he desired his child to receive special religious instruction of a character different from that which it was open to the local education authority to give in accordance with subsection (2) of Section 14 of the Act of 1870. Even they in that House did not carry subsection (2) of Section 14 of a particular Act in their minds, and that was a jargon which was wholly foreign to their public discussions outside the House. It was the language of the House or the language of lawyers, but it was not the language in which they discussed these questions with their constituents. They did not talk of subsection (2) of Section 14 of the Act of 1870. They sometimes called it Cowper-Templeism, which had become a slang phrase, but more often they spoke simply of denominational or undenominational teaching. Why could not they have a form in which the parent should say: "I desire my child to receive undenominational teaching, or the denominational teaching of such and such a Church"? If the Government would meet them on this point, they would sacrifice nothing which was essential to them, and they would give something which was essential to those who, from the undenominational point of view, wished to find a settlement of this question. These three points arose on the Regulations. There were other points which arose out of the wording of the Bill. In the first place, was there any difference intended in the mind of the Government by the difference of the wording in regard to the time when religious teaching was to be given in Clauses 1 and 2. That point was raised by the hon. Member for Oxford University and had not been dealt with. He understood that the Government meant that the denominational teaching should be given within school hours. From his point of view, as one certainly who was trying his best to promote a compromise, it was essential that it should be given in school hours. He understood that that was the intention of the Government, but he wanted to know clearly before they decided to go on with the clause whether that was their intention. He asked the Government to indicate further their intentions in particular with reference to the Amendment standing in the name of his hon. and learned friend the Member for Kingston. Were they prepared to introduce some further words to secure that it should be the duty of the local education authority to provide suitable accommodation so that the authorities should not be at liberty to raise fictitious obstacles on the ground that accommodation was not easily obtainable? He asked further whether the right hon. Gentleman attached any great importance to the limitation of denominational teaching to two days in the week. He did not himself attach very great importance to that from either point of view, because he could conceive that in most denominational schools, outside those where the whole atmosphere was denominational all the day long, and which therefore would be contracted-out under the Bill, that portion of their religious teaching which was not specifically denominational probably now was given on three days out of the five.

MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): Denominational teaching occupies one morning of the week [Cries of "No, no."]

Mr. Austen Chamberlain.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said his object really was not to invite controversy on that point. He said frankly that he did not attach very much importance to this matter, because in the ordinary denominational school there must be a foundation of simple Bible teaching on which to build the denominational superstructure. That must occupy a large proportion of time. At the same time there were many people interested in this matter who would find it easier to accept the clause if the Government could see their way to give more latitude. From his Non-conformist standpoint he attached no importance to it at all, but it would be no sacrifice to say that where denominational facilities were required they should be given on as many days as the denominational body could arrange for giving it. If the Government would make that concession, it would be valued at any rate by some who set great store on denominational schools and their denominational teaching. His object was to draw the Prime Minister's attention to certain specific points, and he hoped that the Committee might have from him some general statement as the result of the further consideration he had given to the clause.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.) said he acknowledged that the right hon. Gentleman throughout had discussed the Bill as a sympathetic critic of its provisions. It was the desire of the Government to make good to the full the assurance he had given on the Second Reading of the Bill that the right of entry which he regarded as an integral part of the proposed arrangement, should be an effective and not a nugatory right. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that he had a perfectly open mind, and if he could show that the language of the clause was inadequate to carry out the real intention of the Government, such criticism would be entitled to receive most respectful consideration. The hon. and learned Gentleman had moved an Amendment for the omission of the subsection, the effect of which, if carried, would be to get rid of the right of entry altogether. That, he took it, was not the intention, but the hon. and learned Gentleman had raised the general question whether or not the Government had in this clause not only given the right of entry, but given it in such a manner that it would be fully enjoyed. He would proceed to deal with the specific criticisms of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, all of which were very relevant. In the first place he did not believe that there was any foundation for the apprehensions that if, and when, this Bill became part of the statute law of the land, local authorities would not endeavour loyally to carry it out. Local authorities were often obliged to enforce laws of which they themselves disapproved, but experience showed that when a local authority was entrusted by the Legislature with a public duty, the members of that authority in practice endeavoured, whatever their private prepossessions or prejudices might be, to obey the law. As the right hon. Gentleman had recognised, the Government had provided the right of appeal to the Board of Education, and he really did not think the Minister for Education, whoever he might be, would be likely in any sense to exercise his power in a partisan spirit.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: If the right hon. Gentleman will allow me, I will make a confession which may not be palatable to all my friends. What I want is to give my friends conclusive proof that it cannot be so exercised.

MR. ASQUITH said that both in regard to the local authority and the Board of Education they were obliged to draw a draft on the future, and the degree of confidence with which that draft was drawn no doubt would vary according to the different quarters of the House in which Members sat. But the real point was this—was this a water-tight clause; in other words did it leave a small margin of discretion or indiscretion, either to the local authority or to the Board of Education, more than the exigencies of drafting would allow? The right hon. Gentleman called attention, first of all, not to the language of the clause itself, but to the language of the draft regulations issued by the Department in order that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen might see clearly the manner in which the clause was to be administered. The right hon. Gentleman took exception to three points. In the first place he referred to the requirements that a parent should make a declaration six weeks in advance. Six weeks was really inserted partly no doubt for reasons of an administrative character, but also largely in the interest of parents themselves. If they waited until the last moment it might be impossible or impracticable for the administrators of the school to make the provisions necessary at the beginning of a school term. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that the Government attached no significance whatever to six weeks. It might be made three weeks or one week. He did not care what the precise period was, but he thought they ought to expect, as a matter of administrative convenience, some notice to be given in order to safeguard the right of entry. Otherwise if these things were left higgledy piggledy at the last moment, it might happen that the accommodation could not be provided. Let it be clear that there was no magic about six weeks. Whatever period of time might be found upon examination to be the one convenient to the parents on the one hand, and to the local authority on the other, the shorter period could be substituted. The right hon. Gentleman next objected to the necessity for repeating this notice when a child was transferred from one department of a school to another. He confessed that that was a matter which had not occupied his attention. He believed that when a child went from one department to another, it often went into an entirely new building, and the act of inserting this requirement arose from that fact. Of course the Government did not desire to label a child during the whole of his school career with a denominational character. This most innocent provision, and in merely from the point of view of administration. Lastly, the right hon. Gentleman referred to the words application form in which the expressed his desire that his child should accordance with subsection (2) of Section 14 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870."

"Receive special religious instruction character different from that which is to the local education authority to

The right hon. Gentleman thought that imposed too great a burden, and that the words of the application might be put in a simpler form. His right hon. friend put them in out of his scrupulous desire to conform with the conditions of the law, but he was quite prepared to substitute a phrase by which the parent should desire special religious instruction for his child and should define the special denominational teaching he desired. Nothing could be simpler than that, and no one would say that it was imposing a burden on the parents. So much for the regulations. He now came to the language of the clause itself and the criticisms of the right hon. Gentleman. With regard to the hours, everybody agreed that 9 to 9.45 were the hours in which this kind of instruction was now obtainable and the right hours to set apart for the purpose.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): May I point out that the language of Clause 1 and Clause 2 with regard to the hours is quite different and very important?

MR. ASQUITH: It is different, I agree, but I do not think it is important. They are the same hours at any rate—9 to 9.45. Everbody agrees on the hours.

LORD R. CECIL: Are they school hours?

MR. ASQUITH: 9 a.m. is the hour at which the school assembles, and between 9 and 9.45 religious teaching, whether Cowper-Temple or denominational, is given and intended to be given.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: When is the register marked?

MR. ASQUITH said that the register was not marked till 9.45, but that applied to whatever form of religious teaching the child was receiving. There was no preference given in that respect between the one form and the other. Both stood in precisely the same position.

MR. RADFORD (Islington, E.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether attendance is compulsory at nine o'clock?

Mr. Asquith.

MR. ASQUITH said that if the hon. Gentleman would allow him he would rather go on with his two points in reply to the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The right hon. Gentleman had called attention to an Amendment in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Kingston, and asked whether the Government would make it perfectly clear that the accommodation to be given to the children receiving this special kind of religious instruction should be suitable. They were quite prepared to make line 27 of the clause read: "any suitable accommodation which can reasonably be so made available."

LORD R. CECIL: That makes it worse and worse.

MR. ASQUITH said that they wanted to make it better, but if the noble Lord thought it made it worse they would not insert it. By subsection 2 there was the express provision that—

"The part of the school house in which the instruction is given shall be properly lighted, warmed and cleaned at the cost of the authority."

These were words which presupposed that the accommodation was suitable for the purpose of instruction to be given. It was intended to provide that the instruction should be given where children could be properly and comfortably taught under the ordinary conditions that prevailed in school life. He did not think that such an extremely suspicious spirit should exist with regard to this matter. He believed these words to be effective, but if better could be suggested let them be suggested. They could not, of course, impose on the local authorities the obligation of putting up a new structure for the purpose of providing for these children, and he did not know that that was what the noble Lord wanted.

LORD R. CECIL: No, no.

MR. ASQUITH said that their meaning was that the local authorities should do their best with the structural facilities they actually possessed, and if additional words were shown to be necessary they would be inserted.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: Will the right hon. Gentleman accept such words as "shall make suitable accommodation unless fresh building would be required for the purpose"? [OPPOSITION cries of "No."] That is the right hon. Gentleman's meaning. Will he consider some words of the kind?

MR. ASQUITH said that the Government were quite prepared to accept any form of words which could be devised to make it perfectly clear that they were only dealing with existing facilities and were going to make the best use of them for the purpose. Lastly, the right hon. Gentleman referred to the number of mornings on which a child was to receive this instruction. He thought that everybody would agree that with the object of making the right of entry real they had provided that every child, and not the school as a whole, was entitled to two mornings. He did not think that they could possibly have gone further to show the bona fides with which the right of entry was intended than by making that express provision. As the right hon. Gentleman had truly said, after all, the foundation of religious instruction would be in the future, as it had been in the past, the Bible teaching given throughout all the council schools, and as a matter of practice, as the hon. Member for Nottingham had said a few moments ago, rarely, if ever, on more than two mornings, was superadded to the fundamental elementary religious instruction, the special denominational instruction that the parent required. He did not think that anyone had asked or desired that each child should have the opportunity on more than two mornings in the week of receiving instruction in the special tenets of its parents. He thought that he had said enough to show, what nobody would dispute, that it was their intention to make this an effective and available right of entry, and that they were prepared, both with regard to the regulation and the language of the clause itself, to meet such criticism as the right hon. Gentleman had made, and to secure by adequate safeguards that this right—unpalatable as it was to many of their own supporters and of the local authorities—nobody knew that better than he did—should be freely and effectively exercised.

*DR. HAZEL (West Bromwich) said that his hon. and learned friend the Member for the Walton Division, who had moved the omission of this subsection, regarded the right of entry for denominational teachers into council schools as a real and substantial concession, and on this account, no doubt, he offered it no real and substantial opposition. He, himself, wished as one who strongly objected to the concession to offer to it as real and as substantial opposition as his humble powers allowed. The Prime Minister had rightly said that the right of entry was unpalatable to many on that side of the House. So unpalatable was it to him that with the best will in the world he was unable to swallow it, and the speech of the right hon. Gentleman had not helped to wash it down. He objected altogether to the principle of the right of entry and in that he was in a considerable minority on his own side. His position was not a pleasant one. The way of the consistent, like the way of the transgressor, was hard; and last ditches made very uncomfortable quarters. He knew that, because this was the second he had been in during the present session. He had thought that if he ever found himself in the last ditch against the right of entry in council schools, that ditch would be better lined than appeared to be the case that day. He remembered how during the 1906 education debates the Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty had thundered alternate scorn and denunciation against this proposal. He wished that they had the hon. Gentleman with them now.

MR. ASQUITH: I have done the same myself.

*DR. HAZEL said that be that as it might, there were some on that side of the House who even at this stage were not prepared by swallowing their principles to break the pledges which they had given to their constituents at the last election. Nobody pretended for a moment that the right of entry was educationally good. It was educationally bad. It would irritate the local authorities and disgust the teachers. They were asked to reverse the policy of the Liberal Party on the ground that this was a part of a compromise. They all admired the tact of the President of the Board of Education. The right hon. Gentleman put this Bill and particularly this proposal before them simply as a piece of political opportunism born of bad logic and good feeling. To cover this pill of right of entry, the right hon. Gentleman supplied them with a certain amount of jam. He wanted to examine the right hon. Gentleman's jam purely in the light of the subsection. The jam was that they on that side of the House had got three principles conceded to them: the public control of rate-aided schools, denominational teaching off the rates, and the teachers relieved from religious tests. He wanted to show that by this subsection of Clause 2 every one of those principles was either actually or potentially violated. Take the first one, public control of rate-aided schools. He failed to find in the Bill any provision which enabled the local authority to object to the right of entry, or to the appointment of any particular denominational teacher who might be approved of by the parents. If the denominationalists said that they had the approval of the parents for this particular teacher, whatever objection the local authority might have to him he could snap his fingers at the local authority and walk in on two days of the week, or as it now appeared from the speech of the Prime Minister on five days a week.

*THE CHAIRMAN said that the point the Committee were now discussing was not the clause, but the subsection (1). and the hon. Gentleman was obviously going beyond that in discussing the question of the teacher.

*DR. HAZEL said he was sorry he transgressed, but the next point he raised undoubtedly came under this subsection, and that was the question of whether denominational teaching would be on the rates. The subsection provided that the authority shall—

“Make available any accommodation in the schoolhouse which can reasonably be so made available.”

Dr Hazel.

And he put it to the Committee that under those words rates would still be called upon to supply the denominations with room, light, warming and cleaning in the council schools. The teacher, of course, would be paid for by the denomination. But let them see how it worked out. Suppose they had an assistant teacher who volunteered to give this teaching, earning £2 a week for a week of thirty hours. That worked out at 1s. 4d. an hour. Suppose that teacher was called upon to give denominational teaching for three-quarters of an hour for five days a week, they would get three and three-quarters of an hour at 1s. 4d. an hour or 5s. That would have to be paid by those who demanded the denominational instruction, but there would be provided at these council schools at the expense of the rates, the building and all the paraphernalia connected with it, and he said that if a careful calculation were made it would be found that the cost, beside the teacher, would be as great as, if not greater, than the cost of the actual teaching. Then what became of the relief of the conscience of the passive resister? He was not there to say whether the passive resister was right or wrong; he was only endeavouring to deal with the position as it appeared to him. What the passive resister objected to was rate aid for sectarian teaching; here was a difference of amount, but not of principle, and he said that under this Bill the principle of rate-aid would remain. He was not surprised, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Education, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, deprecated too much discussion of principle. He came now to the third point. What about the tests for teachers? Clause 1 had already been passed; it read well, and if it stood by itself it would be admirable, but when taken along with this section he said that although the Government abolished tests in name, in fact they kept them, and even added them where they were not before. He was not going to enlarge upon that, but there was from the teachers unanimous condemnation. They said this clause would result in the subtle imposition of tests where no tests existed before.

Of course, they would be told that the teacher need never volunteer, but he was reminded of the American who said: "A man here does what he likes, and if he does not do it we make him." A teacher might volunteer if he liked, and if he did not, it was not unlikely that in some way or another it might be made unpleasant for him. Another point which arose was who was to keep order during the presence of the external teacher. Would the curate, or whoever was imported from outside, keep order, or would the temporal power be there. Would the man with a stick be there to assist the ecclesiastic? He should imagine that there would be poor order if he was not. If the man with a stick was there who was to pay him? Was the denomination to pay or the local authority? He said that this right of entry was a clerical and not a parental demand. The subsection said it should be given where the parent of any child desired that child to receive special religious instruction, and certain regulations had been set out with a form which it was proposed that the parent who desired that instruction should sign. Suppose the parent signed that form, and asked for instruction for his child in the doctrines of the Church of England, what sort of instruction would be given? Suppose the council school served an area in which there were three churches whose incumbents and parishoners had different views—a High Church, a Low Church, and a Broad Church? Which form of religious instruction would the child get whose parent demanded Church instruction? He suggested that this was a most important practical point, because of the difference between the High Church clergyman's teaching and that of the Low Church clergyman.

*THE CHAIRMAN said the hon. Member was again straying from the point. This did not arise on subsection (1), but on other parts of the clause. This subsection only outlined that different religious instruction might be given, and provided that accommodation should be found for it.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil), on the point of order, was understood to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Worcestershire and the Prime Minister had not discussed the whole question of the clause, and whether the Chairman would not apply the same rules of order to other Members of the House that he did to Privy Councillors.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford) inquired whether it was not possible for them to say anything with regard to the observations of the Prime Minister, both with regard to the regulations and the time and other points which arose under other parts of the section.

*THE CHAIRMAN said he allowed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Worcester to put certain questions to the Prime Minister, and of course, the Prime Minister to reply to them, because he understood that they had relevancy, and he thought they had relevancy distinctly to this subsection. He had followed the hon. Member very closely, and where he considered his remarks were relevant to the subsection he had not intervened, but this did not appear to him to be relevant.

*DR. HAZEL said, speaking with great respect, he thought he was applying his remarks to line 21, in which it was stated that—

"Where the parent of any child in attendance at a public elementary school provided by the local education authority desires that child to receive religious instruction of a character different from that which it is open to the local authority to give."

He was endeavouring to discuss the probable character of the instruction, but if the Chairman ruled that he was not entitled to do so, of course, he must pass to something else.

*THE CHAIRMAN said that the clause referred to special religious instruction; All that the parent would have to do under this subsection would be to state that he would require some form of special religious instruction, but he did not think that the kind of religious instruction or the character of the teaching arose on line 21.

*DR. HAZEL said he was endeavouring to ascertain what sort of instruction the parent was likely to get if he did ask for it. It appeared that there would be an interesting question as to what was Church of England teaching.

*THE CHAIRMAN said he would reply to the hon. Gentleman in the words of the subsection—

“Where the parent of any child in attendance at a public elementary school provided by the local education authority desires that child to receive religious instruction of a character different from that which it is open to the local education authority to give in accordance with subsection (2) of Section 14 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, the authority shall, for the purpose of enabling that child to receive that instruction, make available any accommodation in the schoolhouse which can reasonably be so made available.”

That did not raise the question of whether it was in the case of an Anglican, a High Church, or Low Church teacher. It only raised the question of accommodation. The other question could be raised on the clause. It was possible it might be raised on subsection (3), but not here.

LORD R. CECIL, on the point of order, and without wishing to contest what the Chairman had laid down for their guidance, suggested that it had been sometimes the custom of Chairmen of Committees in substance to allow a general discussion on the whole clause on a proposal to omit subsection (1) where there was a general consent on the part of the Committee that that should be done.

*THE CHAIRMAN did not think it would be wise or proper on his part to enter into any such arrangement, because he thought it would lead the Committee on future occasions into very great trouble, and it was not wise to make one rule for discussing a clause in one set of circumstances, and another in another set of circumstances. As far as possible, he thought they ought to keep to the same rule.

*DR. HAZEL said he would obey the Chairman's ruling, and with regret he left the extremely interesting question of what really was the doctrine of the Church of England. But he wanted to say a word or two on the desires of the parent, and the way in which those desires might be carried out under the subsection. He trusted that there would be no relaxation of the regulations in such a way as would enable the bona fide desire of the parent to be avoided by people who were interested in getting something else, because it was quite possible that unless the regulations were made stringent, and kept stringent, there might be a good deal of misrepresentation, and parents might ask for special religious instruction without really knowing what they were asking for. That kind of thing took place when petitions were being organised against the Bill of 1906, and many a parent signed the petition against the Bill believing that he was signing a petition against a Bill which would abolish Scripture and religious teaching in the school. He was therefore particularly anxious that the bona fide wishes of the parent should be respected, and that the regulations should be such as would express that desire clearly so that what the parent was said to desire should not turn out to be some clerical selection. He remembered that some months ago the battle-cry of “Right of entry and right of parents” was raised by his hon. and learned friend the Member for Walton, and by the Bishop of Manchester, who appeared at that time to have elected themselves, respectively, as Emperor and Pope of Lancashire. It was raised in a manifesto which was issued by them—after the manner of the tailors of Tooley Street—in which they spoke in the name of the parents of Lancashire. The main point of that manifesto was the right of the parent to have his child educated in the denomination that he desired, by teachers of whom he approved. That sounded very well, but he observed that one of the parties to that manifesto, the Bishop of Manchester, this time not in collaboration with his hon. and learned friend, had issued a document, which had been in the hands of most Members of this House, dealing with this Bill. Here he found that one of the right rev. Prelate's objections to this subsection was that the teaching might be given by somebody who was approved by the parent but not approved by the clergyman. The right rev. Prelate pointed out that the denominational instructor must be a person approved by the parent, he might or might not be one of the clergy of the parish, he might be one of the clergy from another parish, and then—awful thought —“he might be some layman antagonistic to the clergyman of the parish.”

*THE CHAIRMAN said the hon. Member had again gone beyond his ruling. There was a great difference between this subsection and the clause as a whole.

*DR. HAZEL said he was very sorry so frequently to transgress the ruling of the Chair. This sub-section, which was very wide, included the desire of the parent—

*THE CHAIRMAN said the hon. Member was not talking about the desire of the parent. He was talking about the teacher and teaching, which did not arise.

DR. HAZEL said he had no desire to argue with the Chair.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.), on the point of order, said the matter appeared to be one of the most intense importance, and he would ask with great respect whether the object of the subsection was not to say how the parent might describe the religion he desired, and had not his hon. friend been trying to show the difficulty the parent would have in describing the religion which the subsection allowed to be taught? Was he not in order in so doing?

*THE CHAIRMAN said the hon. Member was dealing with the question of the teacher which he had declared out of order, and now again declared out of order.

*DR. HAZEL apologised, and in justification of his mistake said he wished to say that one of the manifestations of the desire of the parent would be the approval of the teacher, and it was said in the clause he must approve of the teacher, but he passed on. He would say this, however, that the document to which he had alluded, issued by one of the most prominent champions of the parents' rights, showed that the chief consideration was not the right of the parent, but the privilege of the clergy. He said with all earnestness that those who were anxious to restrict, as far as might be, the area of sectarian influence in the educational system of the country, viewed with the greatest alarm, the provisions of this clause. Particularly ominous was the simile used by an eminent divine, who said the clergy were like hounds in the leash waiting to enter the council schools. That being an episcopal simile, he might be allowed to continue it. He preferred to see the clerical pack hunting over their own country, and not in full cry in the council schools. There was much in this Bill that was good, but he would point out that if they had six eggs in an omelet, and one of them was bad, the whole was tainted. He believed this clause tainted the whole Bill. If he were to support it he would be breaking the pledges upon which he had been elected.

LORD R. CECIL said there was one observation which fell from the Prime Minister with which he was happy to be able to agree. The discussion on this particular Amendment had certain disadvantages, especially when it was desirable to get to the details of the clause which were of infinite importance, and would either make this a real clause or render it absolutely valueless. The right hon. Gentleman had appealed to the Committee not to regard this clause with undue suspicion, but before his official duties had called him away the right hon. Gentleman no doubt heard sufficient of the speech of the hon. Gentleman who followed him to gather the reasons why some regarded this with a suspicious view. Could any occupant of the front bench really suppose that this clause, administered by gentlemen in full agreement with the hon. Member who had just spoken, could possibly be regarded by denominationalists as satisfactory? He himself could not possibly regard any clause as satisfactory unless it was of such a nature that it could not be misused by any authority which did not approve of it. They need not go as far as the speech of the hon. Member to see that, because he had the utterance of a Minister whom he was glad to see in his place. The hon. Member for Richmond recently made a speech in which he dealt with this matter, in which he said—

“ They were asked to give in exchange a very big thing called the right of entry. He did not like it, but let them think this. Was the clergyman a very good teacher; did he really like turning out in the morning, going into the school and teaching, with the eye of the teacher upon him to see whether he was doing it well or badly? No, he thought there would be rather a flourish of ecclesiasticism to begin with.”

This, he would remind them, was the language of a Minister of the Crown—

“ But after a bit things would settle down, and the churches would use the money they received for the use of their school buildings to improve their Sunday school teaching, and they would probably leave the elementary schools to be managed by the men who ought to have the control—the teachers appointed and paid by the local authority.”

He did not think, if a Minister of the Crown made that assertion about the concession offered by the Prime Minister, a concession which was intended to be a real concession, the right hon. Gentleman could much complain if the denominationalists regarded it with considerable care and scrutiny. He understood that the teaching under this subsection was to be given on perfectly fair and equal conditions, except where those conditions were varied by the language of the clause itself. There was to be no sub-current of discouragement running through the provisions of this clause, except those provisions which were absolutely essential to secure the object which the Government said they had in view in respect to this matter. Approaching the matter from that point of view, he wished to see if it was of such a nature that those who desired to receive this teaching would get it placed at their disposal, quite fairly and frankly, without any discouragement on the part of the authors or those who would have to administer the Bill. That seemed to be a fair test of this clause. What was the purpose of having these regulations for insuring the control of the parents in this form? Was not the effect of regulations of this character to make it difficult for parents who required special instruction to obtain it? Would it not be more fair to say to the parents of the children who came to the schools: “What do you want—Cowper-Temple teaching or denominational teaching?” and let them answer the question without giving any advantage to one as against another? That was exactly what was done in the day industrial schools, where the arrangement worked perfectly. Unless that was done in the case of these schools, there was no security that the object intended by the Government would be carried out. In many cases the parents were not only busy people, but very ignorant people, and would not have brought to their minds the means of obtaining their desire. The result would be that those interested in this matter would go canvassing about, and they would have that state of things which no one desired. This was the most important part of the clause, and therefore he had been a little elaborate upon it. He wished to know, was this religious teaching to be given during the period of compulsory attendance? That was a matter of vital importance. There were other matters to which, however, he would not refer, such as whether the discipline of the school was to be maintained during this hour, and other matters of that sort. He did not pretend that this concession was satisfactory, or a quid pro quo for what the Church was giving up, but he certainly wished to know whether it was to be a real concession or a mere paper concession which was not worth the paper on which it was written.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) thought that if hon. Members had suggested three years ago that the Government was going to give a right of entry into the board schools of the country such a suggestion would have been scouted by nearly every supporter of the Government. It was said that the position was now changed, but the mere fact that they were getting something in exchange did not alter the result of what they were giving. The name of Dr. Clifford had been invoked in connection with these proposals. A few weeks ago when these proposals were published in the Westminster Gazette, what did Dr. Clifford say in reference to the right of entry? He said that the right of entry was “unspeakably bad” if it were, like Cowper-Temple teaching, left to the option of the people, but it was much worse when, as in the present case, it was coercive of the education authorities. It was with Dr. Clifford that the negotiations were conducted as the representative of Nonconformity, and it was Dr. Clifford who said that the proposal contained in this subsection was much worse than "unspeakably bad." If language had any meaning, how a proposal to which language of this sort could properly be applied could be accepted for any consideration whatever was really more than he could understand. Then in regard to the right of entry the Committee had the further advantage of knowing how its results appeared to the mind of the Prime Minister. In the course of the debate in 1906, the right hon. Gentleman, speaking about the right of entry, said there were three obvious and insuperable objections to it. The first was that the right of entry was not desired; the second was, and this was important, that it would inevitably land them in administrative chaos; and the third was that it would leave them with no security for the genuine religious teaching of the children. The Minister for Education had claimed the other night that he had the Nonconformists of the country at his back. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman had the Nonconformists of the country at his back. It was true, the whole of these proceedings having been so sudden and unadvised, that it might be the Nonconformists were a little dazed. They were a little puzzled by, he did not call it the discretion of their leaders, but at all events, their leaders' sudden conversion, which remained unexplained. About the time when the Bill, including this subsection, became law, if it ever did become law, he was really afraid that the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Education might have a somewhat rude awakening. They had heard a good deal about negotiations with what he might call priest and presbyter, in regard to this matter, but particularly in relation to the subject-matter of this subsection. The Government had not taken into their counsels those whom the subject-matter of the subsection most vitally concerned. They had not consulted those upon whom the really hard practical work of the administration of education fell. They had not taken into their counsels the education authorities of the country, or the managers of the schools, or the teachers, or even the parents of the children. No one in authority seemed to have put to himself the question, which was really a little important, namely, whether this proposal would really work. He had some knowledge of schools, being in fact, in close touch with some of them, and he had no hesitation in saying that the effect of this subsection would be absolutely fatal to the discipline and order of the school. Whichever alternative they adopted, whether they brought in a person from outside or some other person to give the instruction, or whether they employed the assistant teacher to give it, in either case the effect would be fatal to the discipline and order of the school. Suppose the first alternative was adopted, and they brought in a person from outside, an amateur—he would be unable to maintain order. The other day he was conversing with a clergyman, who informed him that good order was maintained in his Sunday school. He was surprised to hear that statement, because he had always understood that good order was not a characteristic of Sunday schools. He asked how such a result had been brought about. The clergyman replied that he had brought in four or five elementary day school teachers to keep order. If they wanted to avoid pandemonium in the school, they must not bring in the amateur, who could not maintain order. It required years of experience to control a class of London children. To avoid pandemonium in the class they would have to bring in the teachers to keep order. On the other hand, suppose the other alternative were adopted, and the assistant teachers were allowed to volunteer. That would be equally fatal to the discipline and order of the school, because the teachers during school hours would be giving instruction for which the head teacher or headmaster was not responsible, and in respect of which he had no authority. That would be really fatal to the good order and discipline of the school. The Government would never even think of introducing this kind of thing into the secondary schools, and he protested against its being introduced into the people's schools, and against those schools being sacrificed by what the Government mistakenly believed to be a political necessity. As a London Member he of course regarded this question with particular interest from the London point of view. In London the effect of this subsection would be particularly unfortunate. In London he found that the accommodation in provided schools was for 595,000, and in voluntary schools for 120,000 children, in round numbers; that was to say, the number of children in council schools as compared with the number in voluntary schools was as about three to one. The proportion in the council schools of London was very much higher than the proportion which obtained in the council schools of any of those parts of the country which at all compared with London. It was obvious, therefore, that in London the area of disturbance which this subsection would produce would be very much greater than in any other part of the country. Why should there be this disturbance? The parents were satisfied with the religious teaching given in the council schools, and the enormous majority of the clergy were satisfied with it, and it really seemed to him that the Government were almost wantonly breaking the peace which had existed for so long. The Bill had been drawn up to effect a settlement, but the provisions contained in this subsection could not possibly be a settlement; indeed, his hon. friend the Member for North-West Norfolk the other night, in a phrase which was right from his point of view, though somewhat maladroit, said that these proposals were emergency proposals. If they were emergency proposals they could not possibly constitute a real settlement. To call that a settlement which was contained in the subsection they were now discussing was really one of the ironies of this matter. Therefore he appealed to the Committee to reject this subsection because it embodied a proposal which would be fatal to the unity of the national schools. For his part he could not see why the Bethnal Green lad should not have the same feeling of loyalty towards his school as the Rugbeian for Rugby, the Harrovian for Harrow, or the Etonian for Eton. He was in the closest touch with the council schools, and he knew the spirit which prevailed in them, and how the common games, the excursions together, and other incidents of school life had produced a growing sense of unity, responsibility, and esprit de corps. He must express the bitter disappointment which he felt that a Liberal Government should try to drive a sword into the very heart of that growing unity by dividing the scholars into groups distinguished by denominational names. For the sake of the children attending the schools he now raised his voice against this subsection, and he proposed to record his vote against it.

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) said he sympathised with the remarks made by his noble friend the Member for Marylebone, and he wished to put a question of a very definite character to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill. It had reference to the words of the subsection, which were most perplexing to the lay mind. Among others who had been more or less perplexed by its language was the Bishop of London, as appeared by a letter from him to the newspapers a few days ago. What was the real meaning of "two mornings a week?" One theory of the subsection was that the school was to be open for the purpose of this special religious teaching two mornings a week; and the other theory was that the words meant that such arrangements were to be made as to make it certain that a child would have teaching of a special character on two mornings a week. There seemed to be a very great difference between those two conditions, for the reason that it was provided by the subsection that certain conditions were to be satisfied, and if they were not satisfied the special teaching was not to be given. He expressed no opinion whatever on the question, but it was only just to those who felt anxiety upon it that the right hon. Gentleman should give a clear exposition as to the real meaning and intention of those words. There had been a great feeling of disappointment in the minds of Churchmen that there was inequality between the provisions of Clause 1 and Clause 2. Most persons, when reading the two clauses, thought there was entire equality, and that Churchmen, Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics were placed in exactly the same position in the two cases, but it was quite clear from the regulations that, without any application of any kind, a child would receive in a provided school teaching under the Cowper-Temple clause. But, on the other hand, in Clause 2 it was provided that instruction could only be given when application was made. That was not equality between the two. It was certainly a great disappointment to those who were looking for equality of treatment under this clause to find that, in the case of Clause 1 Cowper-Temple teaching was to be given automatically, while if there was to be special instruction there was delay and possibly some perplexity to simple-minded and half-educated peasants. What was the right hon. Gentleman's proposal as to giving legal effect to those regulations? Were they to be issued as an Order from the Department, or were they to be laid on the Table of the House, in order that Members might have an opportunity of discussing them? The regulations themselves appeared to be somewhat severe and ponderous in character, and he did not think those who drew them had had sufficient regard to the properly migratory habits of artisans in our great towns. They all knew how many removals took place in each Parliamentary borough every year. They were part of the life of the best of artisans, owing to changes of occupation, and they would in each case require a new notice when the child was sent to a new school. There were points in the regulations which required the most careful investigation, and there were others which he hoped the Government would see its way to change before the Bill passed.

*SIR FRANCIS CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.) thought the hon. Baronet was in error in saying there was to be inequality between the two classes of schools. He was sure they must all regard the President of the Board of Education with the utmost admiration for the diligence with which he had tried to solve this question, for the skill, dexterity, courtesy and conciliation with which he had laid his case before the House. He had not a word to say against the desire for peace shown by the Government in attempting to bring this Bill before the House, and his natural impulse as a party man was somewhat quickened to support the Government even in matters which were distasteful to himself, because of the transparent desire, the intention almost of the Leader of the Opposition, as evinced the previous day, to wreck this attempt at obtaining a settlement on conciliatory, kindly and generous lines as between the religious sections of the community. If what he had to say was contrary to the Government proposal as embodied in the subsection, he hoped his right hon. friend would fully appreciate the spirit in which he spoke and the sense of duty and the long consideration of the subject and long association with it for many years past which compelled him to dissent most profoundly from the proposal of this subsection. He had the warmest respect and admiration for the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Clifford, and many of those concerned in arriving at the compromise, but he thought these questions were too profound in their bearing on national life to be treated as questions, merely to be settled in the studies or the pulpits of ecclesiastics. He would look to the life of the school, to the life of the children, to the whole meaning and machinery of education, and he would say, if they were to look to these broader issues, the suggestion conveyed in the subsection was one which ought to fill with profound misgiving the minds of many who had worked at the education question all their lives. What was the effect of this clause? They were asked to accept this principle of the right of entry into every school as a means of obtaining religious peace and the removal of all the animosities which had beset the course of education for generations past, and paralysed the moral and intellectual forces of education applied to the child-life of the people, which ought to be set free from this wretched friction of religious animosity and the constant contentions of the sects. If he could believe that this right of entry, and all that went with it, would lead to the removal of the religious difficulty and of the tram-mels which had paralysed the forces of education in the past, he should say God-speed to the proposal. But every consideration, every fact, every atom of evidence they had had during those years tended in exactly the opposite direction. He remembered no speech on the Education question quite so vividly as the great speech of the Prime Minister in moving the rejection of the leviathan Bill in 1896. On Clause 27 of that Bill he said on this precise proposal, when advanced by the Leader of the Opposition—

“What evidence is there. I ask, that the parents of the children for whom this religious instruction is provided are dissatisfied? This agitation is a clerical agitation. . . . I do not believe myself parents would be found to avail themselves of this clause, but I can conceive that, under the stimulus of a more or less fanatical propaganda, it may be possible to get together in some of our towns a sufficient number of parents to make the demand. . . . If this clause were carried into effect and worked upon a large scale you would have these children in the future herded, if I may use the word, into separate theological pens, branded and labelled with the names of their particular sects and taught under conditions which must compel them, if they had fairly receptive minds, to attach more importance not to the truths which unite, but to the controversies which divide the religious world.”

There they had words of sound sense, knowledge of human nature and knowledge of the character of this controversial teaching which was to be forced into the peaceful atmosphere which they had preserved uncontaminated and uninterfered with for a generation past in the provided schools. The present Bishop of Manchester, whose career he had followed with very great interest, and whose opinions deserved the very careful consideration of those who were dealing with this issue, was for a long time the distinguished Chairman of the Birmingham School Board, on which he had some practical experience of this system of right of entry. He was also the Vicar of Aston Manor, where the same system was introduced into the schools. In 1905 he made at Manchester a remarkable speech directed to this particular proposal. He was advocating of course, as always full and specific, and exclusive denominational teaching in Church schools. But what was the Bishop's experience of the result of the right of entry? He said that—

“The right of entry was unworkable and unprofitable and certain to bring the religious question in its acutest form into places which the religious question had never yet entered. The Aston Manor school board used to allow different departments of the same school to be hired by different denominations, and what was the result? More than once, as Vicar, he had had Sunday school teachers coming to him with tears in their eyes, telling him that their ‘Tommy,’ who really was a Church child, had been captured by the Wesleyans or some other denomination, and he had no doubt the Non-conformist minister had his teachers coming to him with the same tale. It required all the tact and discretion they could use to keep the peace under those conditions. If he were a schoolmaster he would on no terms allow such a right of entry. The great thing was to maintain the discipline, tone and spirit which belonged to a school, and that depended largely upon the influence of the head teacher.”

They had the philosophy of this question in the speech of the Prime Minister in 1896, from which this proposal so widely diverged, and in the speech of the Bishop of Manchester they had practical evidence laid before them by a strong and determined supporter of the Church of England. It seemed to him that this was a very serious matter. From long experience he felt that the two points of view he had attempted to lay before the Committee had immense force and weight. If instead of bringing peace, the spirit of brotherhood, kindly respect and sympathy into the lives of children of different denominations they were stirring up in their small minds the narrow and contemptible prejudices of bitterness and sectarian animosity, it seemed to him that in pandering to the demand of the ecclesiastics to get at the board schools, on any terms and by any means, they were doing a treacherous act to the child-life of this country, and betraying also the noblest institutions ever evolved by the local government of this country. The late Lord Salisbury, some years ago, in addressing the National Society, advised his friends to capture the board schools under the existing law, and then capture them under a better law. While the Leader of the Opposition, in his legislation on this subject in 1902, spared the board schools, and left them free from contamination and free from this war of the sects, it had been reserved for the Liberal Government of 1908, returned with a majority unparalleled in history, and pledged to the hilt to maintain the principles of national education, to hand over the keys of the people's schools to the ecclesiastics with apologies, and to trust the future of education to this war of the sects. When he thought of these questions, and of all the Education Bills of which they had seen a gloomy procession passing through this House, when he realised that each of them had failed by the intricacy and illogical contradiction of its provisions, he could not help thinking that behind all these Bills there had perhaps been some evil genius at the Board of Education whose dictation and intrigues had led not only to the abandonment of Liberal ideals but also to the failure of one proposal after another.

*SIR PHILIP MAGNUS (London University) said that after listening to the eloquent speech of the hon. Baronet who had just sat down, he could not understand why he had accused the Leader of the Opposition of a desire to wreck this Bill. If the speech of any one would have the effect of wrecking the Bill, surely it would be that of the hon. Baronet himself. Personally, he had no desire to wreck the Bill, although he must admit this was a measure which did not find much favour in any particular quarter of the House. They understood it was a compromise. He was surprised to hear the hon. Member for Bethnal Green refer to the twelve years peace which they had all been enjoying in educational matters since 1896. He was under the impression that they had been in a state of religious warfare during that time. He had scarcely ever been to a political meeting without hearing of religious strife. They had been discussing the education question for the last three years in the House, and he was surprised to find on the Ministerial side of the House that they were now beginning to speak of the religious peace which had existed since 1896. From his own experience of educational work in different parts of the country there had been, in his opinion, as much real peace since 1902 in all educational matters as had existed at any period since 1870. He had always maintained that if the Act of 1902 had been permitted to continue in operation for some time to come undisturbed, they would have heard very little indeed of those religious differences to which his hon. friend opposite had referred. Personally he was extremely desirous that they should come to close terms with the Amendments on the Paper, and that no more time should be wasted in making speeches of a Second Reading character. For his part, he regarded the concession given in Clause 2 as one of considerable value to all persons who believed in denominational education. At the same time, he did not believe the framers of the Bill had recognised fully the extreme difficulty as regarded administration and management which were involved in making this concession. The concession ought not to be a matter of indifference to his Roman Catholic friends who had rightly voted for the omission of the contracting-out clause. As a matter of fact, there were many council schools in different parts of the country in which there was a large number of Roman Catholic children who would, by means of this concession, be provided with the opportunity of receiving denominational teaching. He hardly needed to say that this was a concession which ought to be valued by the Anglican Church, and equally by the Jewish community. There were council schools containing a large number of Jewish children. He knew of a school containing nearly 1,000 Jewish children, and in that school there was not a single Jewish teacher. He thought some alterations would be necessary in the detailed arrangements made in the clauses of the Bill, and it was for that reason very desirable if this settlement was to be accepted that they should approach those details as quickly as possible in order to see whether the Amendments on the Paper were likely to receive the assent of the Government. Personally, he should have liked to have seen two words omitted from subsection (1), and an Amendment had been put down to that effect. The clause stated that this instruction should be given on two mornings, but why should it not be given at some other more convenient time? He did not think it was possible to carry out the principle of the right of entry unless more opportunities were afforded for denominational instruction than were suggested by the admission of the denominational teacher on two mornings per week. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green was quite right in pointing out the difficulties of management and administration which would arise in regard to the right of entry. He trusted that when they came to consider those details the Government would show that they were anxious that the right of entry should be made real and effective. It was very important that they should approach as soon as possible the consideration of the Amendments on the Paper in the limited time which had been placed at their disposal for the discussion of this question, and he would not on that account trouble the Committee any longer.

MR. LLEWELYN WILLIAMS (Cardmarthen District) said he did not wish to give a silent vote on this subsection, because it was a proposal which went to the very root of the Bill. It required a great deal less courage to get up and denounce this compromise than to fight for it, and it would be very easy for him, as it would be for a good many other hon. Members, to take from his pocket old speeches on the right of entry quite as eloquent as the one to which they had just listened from the hon. Baronet the Member for East Northamptonshire. During the last few days he had been reading the debates which took place in the House two and a half years ago in May, 1906, upon the right of entry, in which debates the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham took part. In replying on that occasion his right hon. friend made a very eloquent and convincing opposition to that proposal and pointed out how it was quite unworkable. He remembered that the Solicitor-General and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board denounced the proposal to give the right of entry to these schools. It was quite easy, therefore, for anyone in the House to taunt hon. Members on that side with inconsistency regarding this matter. It was the cheapest form of controversy. He voted for the Second Reading of this Bill, believing that it embodied the proposals which were essential to a compromise, and the only thing he could say in extenuation of his offence, if it was an offence, was that he had been convinced long ago that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was right in the proposal he made in 1906. He said so last May when they were discussing the Second Reading of the previous Education Bill. He was sorry that in the subsection under discussion the Government persisted in one illiberal exception to the proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman then. In this Bill Cowper-Temple teaching was treated as denominational instruction; it received preferential treatment, and that was unfair. That was why he and his friends on those benches believed, as Liberals and Nonconformists should believe, that the State not only had nothing to do with religion on Sundays, but had no right to teach any form of religion on week days. That was why they were compelled to say that the right of entry to all the schools should be granted to all denominations. It was not a position which Liberals or Nonconformists cared to occupy. The right of entry was a thing which he did not care for himself, especially within school hours, and if the teachers were to be allowed to volunteer to give denominational instruction. He confessed frankly that it was a thing which he denounced at the last election. To-day he and his friends were compelled in fairness and equity to support the Government in this matter. The first reason was that, as they were told, it was a compromise. It was a compromise which entailed sacrifices on the Church of England; they had to give up every school they possessed in the single-school areas. Some compensation should be given in justice and fairness for that. In the second place, Cowper-Temple teaching, which was not only believed in by a majority of Nonconformists, but which was endowed out of public funds, was continued by the Bill. In the face of these two things it was only just and equitable that real compensation should be given to the Church of England for the sacrifices they made. If the right of entry was to be granted to them, they must see that the facilities were real and not sham. If the words of this clause were not sufficient to carry out the honest intention of the Government to give real facilities, then it was their duty as honourable men to alter the phraseology in such a way as to give effect to their intention. He had read the clause carefully, and he could foresee no difficulty at all. He could not defend the right of entry in the face of his constituents or in his own conscience on principle. He could only defend it as a compromise. It was only a matter of give and take. He asked the Government: What was the nature of the compromise? Was the compromise embodied in the Bill? He voted for the Second Reading, believing that the compromise was embodied in the Bill. Was that so? If they were to be met later on with further concessions, then he said that the whole situation had changed. If the Bill was an honest agreement between the Government on the one side and the Archbishop of Canterbury and other religious leaders on the other, then, although he disagreed with some of the clauses, he would vote for the Third Reading; but if it did not embody the compromise which had been come to, and if there were negotiations going on somewhere behind their backs, negotiations of which they knew nothing and which might mean further concessions, then so far as he was concerned his support of the Bill was gone. He supported the Bill last week as it stood. He did not mean to say that there might not be small adjustments here and there in the first Schedule. He was not going to haggle over a shilling or so when a great national settlement of a question which had been vexing the community for forty years was at hand. If the Bill went through the House substantially as it stood, it would have his support, not because it was an ideal measure, but because he hoped and believed it would put a stop for some years to come, if not for ever, to those factious and intolerable grievances and discussions which in the past had made the educational progress of the country almost impossible.

MR. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University) said the point they had to consider was whether this subsection made the obligation of the local education authority effective with respect to the right of entry desired by parents whose children were to receive denominational instruction. He regarded this as a business matter of vital importance. The speeches of the hon. Baronet and others were rather out of date. They had passed the Children Bill, which, following the precedent of previous legislation, provided for the system referred to as that of labelling the child as belonging to a particular denomination. The effective right to particular religious instruction was given under the poor law and also under the statutes affecting industrial schools. This was far more than a question of words; it was a question of principle. He hoped the Government would be able to accept the provision in the Industrial Schools Acts. It was very simple, the words being as follows:—

“The local education authority shall, so far as is practicable, make arrangements that such children shall have facilities for receiving religious instruction in accordance with the parents’ desires.”

That was a duty cast upon the local education authority. This clause imposed no duty on the local authority except that of providing a room where it was practicable to do so between 9 and 9.45 a.m., where denominational religious instruction could be given to the children. Was that intentional or accidental? If it was intentional, it went to the root of the whole matter. Effective right of entry was absolutely impossible unless there was cast upon the local education authority a duty beyond that indicated in the clause. There were two different kinds of local education authority to be dealt with in this matter. A large number of authorities took a strong view as to their duty. Their desire was not to do more than they were absolutely required to do by the words of the Act, and so far as they were concerned it was essential that the duty should be cast upon them by the words of the statute. Otherwise, if they did not do their duty, there was no sort of redress. Lawyers knew that when proceedings were taken against a local education authority it was necessary to show that there had been a breach of statutory obligation. On the other hand there were many local education authorities who wished to do what was right and just as between two contending parties; they wished to do their duty honestly without any bias on one side or the other. He had got the moderate Churchman on the one side and the Nonconformists on the other, and then he had to look, and would look, at the exact words of the Act of Parliament, and say: “We must do this much, and no more, because Parliament has laid down these lines of action." It was very important, if it was intended that any further duty was to be imposed on the local education authority, that it should be imposed on them in unmistakable terms. Here there was no obligation on the local authority that these three-quarters of an hour for denominational teaching should be in school hours at all. What made him think that that was not accidental on the part of the draftsman but intentional, was that different words were used when dealing with undenominational teaching. Unless they cast on the education authority the duty in the way he had indicated there was no sort of obligation on the local education authority that denominational teaching should be given in school hours at all. There was nothing to prevent the local education authority making the school attendance begin at 9.45 a.m.; and if they did that, the religious teaching would be given out of school hours. That would be a right of entry to a school which was not a school. Was that really an effective right of entry? He thought that the Government ought to accept the Amendment in order to make the right of entry effective. He need hardly say that all these points were fully in the minds of the local authorities who were hostile to the voluntary school. But assuming that they got the local education authority to decide that nine o'clock was to be the hour for commencing the teaching of denominational religion, and that was to be continued to 9.45 a.m., on two days a week—

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member is discussing the next subsection.

MR. RAWLINSON said he would confine himself to this subsection. The only obligation cast on the local education authority was cast by this subsection. He could not discuss under this Amendment why the facilities proposed to be given were unreal, but unless he got a much more definite assurance from the Government on the points raised by himself and other speakers, he maintained that the right of entry was absolutely ineffective. Why he objected to subsection (1) was that it did not cast the duty on the local authority to say that religious instruction was to be given within the council schools. Under the Poor Law Acts and the Industrial School Acts it was provided that where the parent had proved himself unfit to give his child religious instruction, the local authority was forced, at the expense of the State, to say that the child was to receive proper religious instruction according to the denomination to which the parents belonged. But here, in the case of a parent who had proved himself to be a good parent, when he sent his child to a Church school, they proposed to hedge that right round to an extent which the Committee would agree with him. He made those facilities ineffective. He prayed the Government to put in this subsection words which would make it the distinctive duty of the local education authority to render the right of entry effective.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he wished to make an appeal to the Committee. On the previous day they discussed Clause 1, which embodied what the Church was expected to give up in connection with this Bill. This clause embodied some proposals which were intended to benefit the Church, but in its present shape, he thought it would be admitted, after the speech of his right hon. friend the Member for East Worcestershire, that there were many points which were ambiguous and required alteration and modification. Was it too much to ask that they should have an opportunity of hearing what the Government were prepared to concede in the way of giving greater precision to the clause, so as to allow the Committee to get at the bottom of what their intention really was? The night would be finished otherwise before they got to those details.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.) said he was very reluctant to take part in the debate, and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that he would not stand for more than a minute or two between him and the discussion of those matters which he very properly pointed out were interesting to the party which he represented. He was reluctant to take any part in the debate because he felt that this was a bargain entered into between the Nonconformists on the one hand and the members of the Church of England on the other, and because he associated himself with the views which had been largely expressed on the other side of the House below the gangway. He was in favour of a secular system of education, and therefore he felt he was an outsider in this matter, and that he had no right to intervene. But he could not help recalling the fact that he was the representative of a great Nonconformist constituency in the North of England, and he felt that it was due to his constituents to state briefly his view of this so-called compromise as it was effected by the Bill. As a Churchman he acquiesced in the compromise, qua Churchman. He had followed the debate that afternoon, especially the speeches delivered from the other side of the House, and what had impressed him was the absolute unreality of the criticisms which had been made against this clause; that the whole feeling of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition and those who agreed with him was one of profound dissatisfaction with the entire scope and purport of the Bill. He went further, and said that this Bill was a source of mixed gratification and dislike to the Church of England. He would go still further and say that were he a Nonconformist, which he was not, he should oppose this measure to the utmost of all his powers. He quite appreciated the spirit of his hon. friend who represented a Welsh constituency, because he believed that the Bill from a Church point of view could be and would be made unworkable in Wales. He thought that the local education authorities had under the Bill certain resources which would enable them to defeat what was intended by it. But in England the position was totally different. In England the great bulk of the local authorities who controlled the education of the children would be in sympathy with rather than antagonistic to the Church. The facilities given to the denominations of having access to the schools for denominational instruction to the children would, he believed, be made as facile as possible. This was called a compromise, and he had always been taught that a compromise was necessarily founded on some bilateral arrangement. But he would point out that he was unable to find—and he challenged the Leader of the Opposition to indicate—in what single respect this presumed compromise did not deal entirely in favour of the Church of England and against the Nonconformists. He did not want to indulge in generalities, but he asked what the elements of a compromise were to be? They were going to give up in single-school areas the whole denominational teaching.

MR. J. W. WILSON (Worcestershire N.) inquired if it was in order for the, hon. and learned Gentleman to refer to these matters. They wanted to get on with the rest of the clause.

*THE CHAIRMAN said the hon. and learned Gentleman was certainly allowing himself very great latitude. He was listening to what he said, and so far as he could see he had been on his feet five minutes and he had not really approached the subsection they were discussing.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES said he was sorry that was the case. He understood this subsection to involve the questions as to whether or not in the provided schools this instruction was to be given. Of course, he bowed to the Chairman's decision, but he conceived that he was justified in pointing out what he thought to be the radical defect in this measure. He quite appreciated the motives of his hon. friend's intervention, and would not say more than this, that with regard to what he conceived to be the paramount effect of this section it was contended that the Nonconformists gained public control over every school in a single-school area, but that was accompanied by this curious anomaly, that in single-school areas the existing teachers were still to be allowed to teach dogmatic religion.

*THE CHAIRMAN said that did not arise on this subsection. All that this subsection did was to say that in the circumstances described the accommodation should be available. Another subsection dealt with the teacher.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES said he thought on this subsection it was competent for him, in accordance with the trend of the debates hitherto, to review the whole purport of the section. Previous speakers had dealt with the whole clause, and not with a single detached department of it. In view of the Chairman's ruling, however, he would bring his observations to a conclusion. Hon. Members on that side of the House must not imagine that he was speaking in any spirit of antagonism to the Government. He was desirous of seeing a modus vivendi, although he was precluded on this part of the discussion from stating his opinions. The allowing of the Church to have the right of access to provided schools was an invasion of that which had lasted for nearly forty years with the greatest advantage to the cause of education, and speaking as a Liberal, and as one who represented a Nonconformist constituency and sympathised with the Nonconformist attitude on this question, he for his part, although he gave the fullest credit to his right hon. friend for his desire to bring this controversy to a peaceful conclusion, could not help expressing his profound regret, which he was sure was echoed not only by Nonconformists, but by all those who loved education, that this solution of the question had been proposed by a Liberal Government.

MR. RUNCIMAN joined in the appeal of the Leader of the Opposition that the Committee should at once come to a decision on the Amendment. They had had a general debate on the subsection, and sometimes they had wandered over the other subsections in the clause, and it was necessary and desirable to come to a decision. There was no difference of opinion between the two sides on the main object of the Bill. They wanted to provide for a real right of entry, about which there was no doubt or suspicion, and it was only about the details of the Bill that there was any doubt. He hoped the Committee would come to a decision on this subsection, and then they could get on to the other subsections.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland) was rather surprised at the appeal by the Leader of the Opposition to bring this discussion to a close, considering that this particular Amendment emanated from his own side of this House. He was not aware that anyone had spoken from those benches as to the right of entry. For the fourth time they were discussing the question of the religious welfare of the workman's child, and he wished to say, as a workman whose children attended a public elementary school and as a Churchman, that he was just as anxious to have this question settled as any hon. Member in the House, but he was not going to assent to its being settled if the settlement proved to be inefficient from an educational standpoint. There were people who said they had discussed the religious well-being of the workman's child too long, and had neglected the other educational interests of the children from a mental and physical point of view, and therefore he believed if they could have a peaceful and honourable settlement of this question, he and his friends would not stand in the way. But he ventured to think they were not going to have a peaceful settlement by this particular Bill. Instead of having peace in the public elementary schools under this Bill, he ventured to assert that they were going to have confusion and discord. As one whose children attended public elementary schools he had never yet heard of religious differences inside those schools, although they certainly had a good deal of talk by eminent clerics whom he respected. But this was a parent's question as well as a cleric's question, and he joined with the hon. Gentleman who said that the two people principally affected had not been consulted, viz., the parents and the teachers. He ventured to think that if they gave a right of entry to all the various denominations to teach their particular creeds they would not bring about that education of the children that they desired to see, and that they would spread the confusion and discord to which he had referred. But if there was going to be a settlement of the question he must admit that they had to give fair play to all the creeds and denominations if they once conceded the right of entry. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill not to relax in any way what he had settled with regard to the demand of the parents to have a religious education for their children. He ventured to say that, if the right hon. Gentleman insisted that the parents must apply for the religious education of their children, in two or three years he would have his eyes opened, and would realise as far as the parents were concerned that they were not so excited or animated with regard to these religious differences as they were led to believe in the House. He hoped, therefore, if they were to have this concession as to the right of entry, that the right hon. Gentleman would adhere to the form that he had set up that the parents must make the necessary application. As to the clergymen, he knew clergymen of all denominations, and he did not think they were so enthusiastic as to turn out every morning to go down to the schools to give religious education. He ventured to think that their eyes would be opened from that standpoint also, and that the clergymen were not so keen as they were led to believe they would be to give this religious education to the children. In conclusion, for himself, and he thought for his colleagues, he looked with suspicion upon this concession of the right of entry, and he thought that in order to prevent that peace in council schools which now existed being disturbed, he must go into the division lobby and vote against this particular part of the clause.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
 Hazel and Mr. Pickersgill.

MR. HUTTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Morley) said the Amendment he now proposed to move would have the effect of limiting the privilege the Committee had just conceded to the transferred voluntary schools. The right of entry should not be extended to the council schools of the country, those schools which had grown up in the land in which no kind of denominational teaching had ever been given. Hereafter denominational teaching of any kind should be confined to the transferred voluntary schools. He supposed the granting of this right of entry was a part of a larger scheme, that it was part of a bargain and did not stand by itself. He had often heard that in that bargain the Nonconformists had given up something in permitting this right of entry into the council schools; but the Nonconformists had no right to give up anything. It was not in the province of the Nonconformists as such to yield this privilege of right of entry into the elementary schools. They were State schools, the property was State property, the schools were organised and maintained by the State, and it was wrong to say that this concession had been made by the Nonconformists. He had never claimed that the Nonconformists as such had any special rights in the Council schools. Cowper-Temple teaching was not Nonconformist. It was inserted in the Act of 1870 in order to please the Conservative party, and he noticed whenever there was any chance of its disappearing the Archbishop of Canterbury came forward and stipulated that it should continue to be given in the schools. Cowper-Temple teaching had not, and never had been, in any sense Nonconformist teaching, and the Nonconformists as such had no right to give this concession. From a letter which appeared in the Manchester Guardian on the previous day it would be seen that the Bishop of St. Asaph did not regard this Bill as sufficient. The Bishop of St. Asaph required more facilities for contracting-out, a more extended rent for the schools to be transferred, and other conditions added to it. His own fear was that the Government had conceded this right of entry into the council schools without there being any prospect that this would be an end of the difficulty. Already more was being demanded. The hands of his right hon. friend were tied, but those of the Bishop of St. Asaph and of the Archbishop of Canterbury were not, and already those gentlemen were coming forward and saying they must have more. He thought he had shown that these negotiations had not been altogether wisely carried on by the representatives of the Government. The terms of settlement would never have been assented to by his right hon. friend but for one thing, that they were to have educational peace. Was this kind of right of entry into the council schools of the country to bring educational peace? They were going to destroy the unity of the schools, they were going to destroy simplicity of administration. By Clause 1, not a word of which had been discussed, they had made the teaching of religion absolutely compulsory, and added to that was the right of the parent to require religious instruction for his children. They were to have a division of scholars into the sheep and the goats; but more than that, they would also have trouble outside the schools. They were certain to have canvassing of the parents. Did his right hon. friend look at that prospect with equanimity? There was another right of entry which the parents had gained, and it was in connection with free education. Free education was impossible to a great many parents because the only school in their district charged a fee. There was no alternative school within reach, and the only right was the right to demand a free place for a child. But that very rarely succeeded. He remembered one instance where the fathers wanted free education for their children, and a number of them banded together for the purpose of achieving their object. No sooner had they presented their petition for free education than the curates went to the mothers, who signed another petition to the authorities asking them to refuse the free education asked for by their husbands. Now, they were certain to have this kind of canvassing. They were inviting it. They would certainly have the clerical interest at once set to work to get up a petition by the fathers or mothers, whichever were the more easily persuaded, to demand this right for themselves and their children inside the public elementary schools. Frankly, he thought he would rather have a Church school in the village than have put upon the parents the difficulty of having to refuse the request of the clergy to demand facilities in the schools for religious teaching. Social boycott was absolutely certain to follow refusal. What was to happen in the village where at present there was only a council school? At any rate there was peace there now, but were they going to have it in the future? Wherever they had church schools or council schools they were introducing educational warfare and social warfare as well. He deplored the result of the proposals of his right hon. friend. Who was going to enjoy this right of entry? The parents were going to have the right to demand a special kind of religious instruction. Was it to be limited to the Roman Catholics, and the Church of England, and certain Nonconformists? There was a church called the Labour Church. Had the parents who were members of that the right to demand for their children special religious instruction? The hon. Member for Oxford University was anxious about the way in which the council schools would be used on Sundays. He remembered a little more than a year ago his catechising the First Lord of the Admiralty about the use of council schools on Sundays for the instruction of children in Socialistic doctrines. Take the Labour Church. Were parents who were members of that church to have the right to demand for their children special religious instruction? What kind of religious instruction would it be? Were they opening the door to catechisms of all kinds, political and religious as well? He saw no reason why they were not. He saw no sign in that clause of educational peace. On the contrary, he saw great difficulty, canvassing, and boycotting. Lord Londonderry said this proposal had "neither practicability nor popularity," and when the right hon. Gentleman opposite had charge of the Education Bill of 1902 they all knew what his opinion was. He said it was an idea greatly favoured, but he did not think it was possible to put it into force. He failed to see why one man was allowed to steal the horse while another man was not allowed to look over the hedge. His hon. right friend opposite must marvel now at his own moderation in 1902 in this respect. He thought that the case made on the proposal in 1902 ought not to be given away by the present Government, and he hoped that even yet they would have his right hon. friend announcing, when he came to find himself under the pressure of the Archbishops and the Bishops to give further securities, that he had already gone beyond what he thought were the limits of the case. He forbore quoting his right hon. friends on the Treasury bench.

Mr. Hutton.

He could quote them all, but he thought it rather a humiliating position when a whole Government could be quoted in a sense contrary to the principles of their Bill, and contrary to one of its main provisions. It was said that the Bill was to bring peace. On the contrary he thought that the Bill would do more harm to education and religion than any other proposal that he had known any Government to make itself responsible for since he had been in the House.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, lines 20 and 21, to leave out the words 'public elementary school provided by the local education authority,' and to insert the words 'transferred voluntary school.'"—(Mr. Hutton.)

● Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

MR. RUNCIMAN said he made no complaint against his hon. friend for the speech which he had just delivered. It was exactly what one might have expected from him, for he was nothing if he was not consistent, though he was consistent to the point of being impracticable. The hon. Gentleman would rather be consistent than see anything done for the parents who now had to send their children to the village schools. He would rather be consistent than free the teachers who, in those village schools, were subject to religious tests; and there, he must say, he parted company with his hon. friend. He thought the advantage of freeing these village schools and teachers was so great that they were justified now in giving away the power which they possessed of exclusion from all the council schools of the country. His hon. friend said that his hands were already tied, and had practically suggested that the representatives of the English Church had got the better of him in this bargain. As he understood, there were some Members in the House who thought it was he who had got the better of the representatives of the Church in this bargain. He was inclined to think that when both sides complained, the Government could not be very far wrong. He did not object to his hon. friend making references to some of the speeches made by Ministers in the past against the right of entry. But it should be remembered that the right of entry which was then spoken of was a right of entry put forward as a distinct act of aggression. They were not offered anything by the other side, and they were not to gain control by the council of a single parish school. But the case was now entirely changed, and they had a distinct and substantial offer made. He was quite sure that hon. Gentlemen opposite would not for one moment say that the offer made by the Church was not a substantial offer. His hon. friend drew a lugubrious picture of the facilities in operation. He said that in most cases there would be canvassing among the parents to send their children to these schools. They must all admit that there had been clergymen in the past, and there might be now, who had abused their position, but this would not enable them to abuse it any more than they had abused it in the past. Did his hon. friend suggest that he could prohibit the vicar of a parish from visiting his parishioners? If the vicar of a parish abused his position, he presumed there were ways of dealing with him. After all, the vicar of a parish had not altogether a very easy task. In many parishes the vicar would find it difficult to carry on Church work if he abused his position. He would gain for himself unpopularity in his own parish, and he might throw up the sponge at once because his work for good there would be absolutely gone. He did not say there might not be cases where pressure was brought to bear on the parents of children quite unjustifiably. He quite admitted that many parents might submit, but he doubted very much, if this settlement went through, that they would find the system abused. After all, they must remember the altered temper which existed in relation to matters of education. During the whole of this controversy in the past, each side had been in its trenches, and each had fired on the other whenever it got a chance, but neither had ever left its trenches. The local administration of the country had been coloured by the controversy, and, as he had said on previous occasions, coloured to the detriment of education. If this settlement went through, as he hoped it would, it would give satisfaction to the great body of administrators, and to those who sent their children to the schools. They would have in the whole of the constituencies of the country, in the county councils and the borough councils, a feeling of amity which had not been known in educational matters for ten years past; and the only justification he had for asking his hon. friend's support of the right of entry into council schools was that it was a bargain, and they could not expect at this hour the Church to fulfil her part of the bargain if they adopted the advice of his hon. friend and withheld the very thing which she regarded as one of the most treasured items.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
 Hutton and Mr. Yoxall.

MR. WEDGWOOD (Newcastle-under-Lyme) who had given notice of his intention to move to insert after the word 'authority' the words 'disapproves of, or is dissatisfied with, on conscientious grounds the religious instruction which it is open to the local education authority to give in accordance with subsection 2 of section 14 of The Elementary Education Act, 1870, and in consequence' said: I gather that my Amendment cannot be accepted, and that it would upset the nice equipoise of the Bill. I do not, therefore, move.

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL in moving to leave out the word "desires," and insert the words "expresses a desire that," said a parent applying for special instruction or his child was put to considerable trouble, inconvenience, and delay. He would repeat the question he had put a few moments ago, whether it was intended that these regulations should be issued at once on the authority of the Education Department, or whether they were to be laid on the Table of the House with opportunities for discussing them during a reasonable number of weeks. He hoped the latter course would be adopted, because it would give opportunity for consultation and discussion, and he believed it would facilitate the carrying out of the regulations. Knowing, as he did, something of the habits of the working classes in our manufacturing towns, he thought six weeks would be in many cases extremely inconvenient. The most worthy members of the class moved from one part of the town to another. Opportunities of work in a particular mill or factory varied from time to time and they were obliged to change their residence. He was quite sure they would feel it a very great hardship to be called upon to issue new applications on every occasion. These points were really of very great importance. He wished to remove doubts and to say something which might conduce to such modifications of these regulations as might procure their more effective working.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 21, to leave out the word 'desires,' and insert the words 'expresses a desire that.'"—(Sir Francis Powell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'desires' stand part of the clause."

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. TREVELYAN, Yorkshire, W.R., Elland) said the Government had no objection to accepting this Amendment. It appeared in effect to be a verbal Amendment and expressed perhaps a little more clearly the object they had in view. The Prime Minister had made it perfectly clear that these regulations were only put forward as a draft with a view to seeing what the authorities of the Church thought of them. With regard to the term of six weeks before the commencement of the school, he wished to make it clear what the Minister for Education intended. It was thought that there should be full opportunity for the facilities being started at the beginning of the term. There was a vacation of four weeks before one of the terms, and the idea was that the parents should express their desire for facilities by giving an announcement of their desire before the last term came to a conclusion. The Government felt it would very likely be preferred that this request should be made a week before the term started, and they simply put forward the period named as their first proposal. If they gathered that it was the opinion of hon. Gentlemen opposite and the authorities in the Church that it would be simpler and more satisfactory to have a shorter period the Government would be ready to accept that general view, and make the regulations in accordance with the general desire of those parents who wished to have the facilities.

MR. LYTTLETON (St. George's, Hanover Square) said the point which he thought was of great importance was that the desire to be expressed by the parents for Cowper-Temple religion and for special religion should be expressed identically in the same manner. It was most undesirable from his point of view that there should be any difference in the manner of expressing the desire of the parent for Cowper-Temple teaching and for special religious teaching. As the Bill stood at the present moment no method of expressing the desire of the parent was laid down, although it was mandatory upon the authority to set aside for three-quarters of an hour the school for Cowper-Temple teaching for the children whose parents desired that they should receive that instruction. There was no provision at all as to how that desire was to be expressed or ascertained. Did the Government presume that intention, or, if no desire was expressed, would the child be obliged to have secular education? Subsection (b) of Section 1 set aside for three-quarters of an hour the school for Cowper-Temple teaching, but it enacted that that teaching should be given to those parents who desired the children to receive that instruction. No provision was made in the Bill prescribing the mode by which the desire of the parent was to be expressed or how it was to be ascertained by the local authority. He wished to know specifically if no desire was expressed one way or the other, would Cowper-Temple instruction be given to the child automatically? If that were so, he submitted with great respect that it was not right that, in the absence of any express desire for Cowper-Temple instruction, that instruction should be taught as a matter of form. Obviously what was fair was that the expression of both desires should be in the same form, and should not be influenced in the smallest degree by the procedure of the local education authority. The Prime Minister had expressed his desire to treat both forms of religious teaching with absolute fairness and equality, and it was very important to obtain that result.

MR. RUNCIMAN did not know whether this point was quite germane to the Amendment, but in answer to the right hon. Gentleman he might say that they proposed, with regard to Cowper-Temple teaching, to leave it in exactly the same position as it was now. It would be a very serious matter for the Government to disturb an arrangement which had stood good for thirty-eight years and was well recognised by parents all over the country. They did not propose to make any change as regarded Cowper-Temple teaching.

LORD R. CECIL said the Government on this point spoke as if this proposal was only to apply to council schools. If the principle of the right hon. Gentleman was to be observed—

*THE CHAIRMAN: I allowed this question to be put, although I thought it was very doubtful whether it was in order. What the noble Lord is now doing is arguing upon something we have already disposed of upon Clause 1.

LORD R. CECIL contended that he was not out of order because he was opposed to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wigan, which seemed to him to increase the difference between the two forms of religious instruction which already appeared in the Bill. He thought he was entitled to reply to the Minister for Education who desired that a distinction should exist, and he had accepted the Amendment on the ground that it emphasised that point. On this Amendment he claimed that he was entitled to show why he did not desire any difference made between Cowper-Temple teaching and religious instruction of a different character. The Board of Education had justified the treatment of Cowper-Temple instruction differently in this respect from denominational religious teaching, because the right hon. Gentleman said that Cowper-Temple instruction had for thirty-eight years been the rule, and parents all over the country knew what their rights were in regard to it. That, however, was the reverse of the fact when they came to deal with transferred voluntary schools. He did not think it was a good argument even with reference to council schools, but it was clearly bad when they dealt with transferred voluntary schools. If the view of the right hon. Gentleman was to be carried out, what they ought to provide was that in every transferred voluntary school the old religious teaching should be given as a matter of course, and it should only be when the parents expressed a desire for Cowper-Templeism that they should get it in those schools. This seemed to him to be a really crucial question, and he thought it was a point on which they were entitled to test the reality of the facilities offered. Unless a real, fair, and unbiassed choice was given it would be, to use the expression of the hon. Member for North-West Ham, playing with loaded dice, and he desired that they should deal fairly and absolutely impartially between the two kinds of religious instruction. Unless that was the intention of the Government these facilities would be exactly as they were described by the hon. Member for Richmond, namely, a mere temporary silencing of the consciences of Churchmen, which was intended to pass away, leaving a universal undenominational system of religious instruction throughout the country. The real question was, were these facilities to be effective or not? He did not believe that the bishops and archbishops who had gone so lightly into these negotiations intended that Cowper-Temple religion should be given an advantage from the outset. He did not believe that was their intention now. They thought evidently that in these provisions—he did not think they were all familiar with the construction of Acts of Parliament—they had got a real, definite, and effective right of entry. Unless the two forms of religious instruction were treated impartially they had not got an impartial right of entry. He was asking for complete impartiality and not for anything new.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I have been looking into the point of order. I do not see how this matter can be raised on this Amendment. I think, however, it can be raised on the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for West St. Pancras.

LORD R. CECIL said in that case he would not proceed with his remarks and he hoped the hon. Baronet would not press his Amendment.

MR. JAMES HOPE urged his hon. friend not to press his Amendment.

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL said his desire was to make the provisions as to both teachings identical, but the course of the debate under the restrictions imposed had rendered it impossible to raise that issue, and therefore he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment because it had already served the purpose he intended.

MR. FORSTER (Kent, Sevenoaks) said that before leave was given to withdraw the Amendment he wished to invite the President of the Board of Education to give an answer to the point raised by his right hon. friend as to whether the form in which the parents' desire was to be expressed was really the same in regard to Cowper-Temple teaching as it was in regard to special religious teaching in the transferred schools. The right hon. Gentleman did not answer that point, and he hoped he would tell the Committee now whether they were to express their desire in the same form and language.

MR. RUNCIMAN did not think it was necessary to follow up the point, because the hon. Member knew what happened now in regard to Cowper-Temple teaching. He was equally well aware that in voluntary schools on four days in the week and sometimes on three days in the week there was given what was almost identical with Cowper-Temple teaching in those schools. [Cries of "No."] It was proposed that in the transferred voluntary schools the education should be treated in the same way as before. The system would not be altered.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON Oxford University) said the right hon. Gentleman had not put the matter in a very satisfactory way. Under the present arrangement as the law stood, the child attending a council school got Cowper-Temple teaching. The child who went to a voluntary school got automatically the religious teaching of the denomination to which the school belonged. It might very well be that ordinarily what might be called Christian teaching in certain Church schools would differ very materially from the teaching given in council schools. As he understood the right hon. Gentleman, it was proposed that Cowper-Temple teaching should be the normal teaching, and that the child should get it automatically whether the parent expressed any desire or not, but that in the case of other teaching there should be an expression of desire on the part of the parent. If the right hon. Gentleman meant that, he wished to call his attention to the fact that the Bill had not said so. The words of the first section did require that the parent should express a desire that his child should receive certain teaching. Hitherto there had been no requirement of any such expression on the part of the parent, and, therefore the first clause as it stood, did not express the intention of the right hon. Gentleman. The clause which they were discussing did not express what he and his friends wished to see expressed, and he would point out that the only way to solve the difficulty was to throw on the local education authority the onus of ascertaining what was the desire of the parent in every case in respect of the religious instruction to be given to his child.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Runciman.

*SIR W. J. COLLINS (St. Pancras, W.) moved an Amendment providing that where the parent of any child in attendance at a public elementary school provided by the local education authority desired that child to receive religious instruction, the authority shall make available any accommodation in the schoolhouse which can reasonably be so made available. He admitted that this Amendment lost some of its point, because, on account of the falling of the guillotine (for which he did not vote) on the previous night, he had not been able to move an Amendment to Paragraph (b) of Clause 1, of which he had given notice, and which, if it had been carried, would have made the proposal symmetrical. His object was to secure perfect equality of treatment in respect of Cowper-Templeism and denominational religion, to draw no distinction as to the use of the school premises between the two. When the Bill of 1906 was before the House he voted for the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Burnley, which proposed that any religious instruction given in school premises should be outside the school curriculum, and not at the public expense. He desired to raise that question now, in so far as it could be raised on this Amendment. Those who objected to the right of entry founded their objection mainly on the fact that the religious instruction would be part of the school curriculum. A great deal of that objection would be removed if, while the use of the school premises was allowed for religious teaching, that teaching was apart from and not a part of the school curriculum provided at the public expense. He wished to draw no distinction, so far as the use of the school premises was concerned, between Cowper-Templeism and other religious instruction. That might be regarded as closely similar to what was spoken of as the secular solution, but now that so much deference was being paid to the wishes of the parent, in regard to religion it necessarily followed that the religious instruction ought to be given outside the compulsory curriculum of the school and at the expense of those who wished to have their religion taught. Students of Stuart Mill would remember that the reason he gave to justify the intervention of the State in the matter of education was that the case was not one in which the judgment of the consumer was a sufficient guarantee for the goodness of the commodity. In the particular case of religious instruction the judgment of the parent was now supposed to be a sufficient guarantee for the goodness of the commodity, and on the principle laid down by Mill this ought not therefore to be a matter for State intervention, but ought to be dealt with outside the compulsory curriculum of the school. He saw no objection to the proposal that the granting of the use of the school premises should be obligatory on the local education authority, subject to the condition that the accommodation could reasonably be made available. At present school premises were let at almost nominal rentals for a great variety of purposes. In some cases they had been let for Socialist schools on Sunday, and if they were let for that purpose, he could not see why they should not be available outside of school hours for those children whose parents desired that they should receive instruction in accordance with the tenets which they held.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 21, to leave out from the word 'instruction,' to the word 'make,' in line 27, and to insert the words 'the authority shall.'"—(Sir W. J. Collins.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out to the word 'that,' in line 22, stand part of the clause."

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir W. ROBSON, South Shields) said he recognised the importance of the Amendment, especially from the point of view of hon. Members opposite. But the issues were well understood. The question here was whether there should be any form of religious teaching which should operate normally in the schools. But the local authority could not tell to which of the various denominations in its district the parents wished to adhere, and the parent had to make a selection if he wished a special form of religious teaching to be given to his child. Did hon. Members opposite, who were most likely to support this Amendment, wish that a large number of parents who might be indifferent, apathetic, or careless should have no form of religious teaching automatically provided? He supposed that among the adherents of religious teaching there were many persons who would rather see some elementary form of religious instruction automatically provided, even though they might not agree with it or believe that it satisfied their wants. The effect of the Amendment would be to disestablish and disendow religious education in general, only leaving it applicable in cases where the parent was sufficiently in earnest about it to make a specific request. He did not think that this was exactly what hon. Members opposite meant, while on the point raised by the Amendment the Bill did make a distinction between Cowper-Templeism and other forms of religious instruction. His noble friend the Member for East Marylebone desired an explicit answer from the Government on the point. He thought that was reasonably clear on the face of the Bill itself. In Clause 2 power was given to the Board of Education to make regulations as to the manner in which the parent was to communicate with the local education authority. There was no such power in Clause 1. He thought that was a distinction. Did hon. Members really desire that there should be no distinction whatever between the normal religious teaching of the school and the teaching which required to be specified and particularly demanded in writing? It was a very remarkable tribute to the attitude of the community towards the provision in the Act of 1870 with regard to Cowper-Temple teaching. That provision had worked without complaint, without suspicion, without friction, and without difficulty throughout the country. He understood that only thirty local authorities in England and Wales did not adopt that provision. Why, then, should this rule be withdrawn? The Amendment, he thought, would put a novel and unnecessary impediment, though a slight one, to the giving of religious instruction, and he thought that on reflection the hon. Member would not consider that that was desirable. The Bill itself was founded on the assumption that there should be a form of religious teaching.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON said he thought that it was quite possible to effect what they wanted without creating any invidious distinction between this or that form of religious teaching. He entirely agreed with the Attorney-General that it would be a pity in many parts of our crowded towns where parents were indifferent and there was not that access to various forms of spiritual advice which would bring home to them their responsibility to their children, that the parents should be called upon to give their opinion before the children received any religious instruction at all. Might it not be assumed in every school that the parents desired their children to have some religious instruction? Might they not on that assumption make it the duty of the local education authority to ascertain what form of religious instruction the parent desired? That might be done without imposing any undue burden on the local authority and without making any invidious distinction between one form of religious teaching and another; and would secure that every child would get the religious teaching which the parent desired.

LORD R. CECIL said he had listened to the Attorney-General's speech with considerable interest. The argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman was that there should be a State form of religion.

SIR W. ROBSON said he certainly never said anything of the sort; he was the last man in the House to say so.

LORD R. CECIL said he did not know what on earth the hon. and learned Gentleman meant then in his speech. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that in the case of apathetic parents who would not say whether their children should have any religious teaching at all, the local authorities should see that some form of religious teaching was given. As he understood the argument on the other side, it was that there ought to be established and endowed in every school some form of religious teaching, which might be of a particular character or no particular character, and that that was to be given to all children unless the parents took the trouble to demand under the terms of an Act of Parliament, religious instruction of a different character which they desired. He maintained that that was not just, that that was not making the facilities for giving special religious teaching effective. They were loading the dice. They were saying that one form of religious teaching should be given. They were not dealing on this section with the question whether the religious teaching should be paid for by the parents or whether there should be freedom of religious teaching. What they were arguing now was that the parent should be asked when his child came to school: "What particular form of religious teaching do you want for your child?" That was done in the day industrial schools of the country with perfect satisfaction to all concerned; so that there was nothing novel in what they were asking by this Amendment. They were only asking what was already the law with regard to the industrial schools, and that did not seem to him to be an excessive demand. The hon. Member for Morley said that this provision requiring a petition from the parents would infallibly lead to canvassing by the ecclesiastical individuals whom he called curates, and the hon. Gentleman thought there was a danger in that. He was delighted and refreshed to hear from an hon. Gentleman opposite that the charge was quite unfounded that opportunities were made use of by the clergy of the Church of England to put unfair pressure on the parents of the children in the parish who were not members of their denomination to sign petitions in favour of religious instruction. If such a danger existed, it would absolutely disappear if it was made the duty of the State to say when a child came to school: "What religious teaching do you want? That religious teaching which you want shall be given to you within the limits of practicability." Surely that was simple justice. He could not understand how, when they had the example of the system working well in the day industrial schools, which had produced the most admirable results, and had never divided the esprit de corps of the schools, they should adopt a new-fangled system which had nothing to be said for it except that it would put the voluntary schools at a disadvantage.

*MR. ADKINS (Lancashire, Middleton) said he was quite unable to accept the view of the noble Lord as to a special form of religious teaching. Many of those on that side of the House would not support this Bill, or help this suggested compromise, if they thought it was going to upset the practice followed for so many years of Cowper-Temple teaching being the ordinary religious teaching as matter of course in the public elementary schools. There was this difference between that teaching and the special teaching which the noble Lord had so ably and conscientiously put before this House, that the latter was connected with the fortunes and desires of particular religious societies, and if those ideals were carried out by this Amendment they would have every school in the country a place in which rival religious organisations were laying the greatest stress on all sorts of teaching which was in the highest degree controversial, and which was bound to be for the interest of particular religious societies.

LORD R. CECIL desired to point out that none of these criticisms turned out to be accurate when they dealt with the day industrial schools.

*MR. ADKINS said he was coming to the day industrial schools, which loomed so large in the noble Lord's view. Whatever might be said against Cowper-Temple teaching, it had during the last thirty-five years proved less controversial, and led to less acute differences, than any other more complete forms of religious instruction, and when they had to deal with the undoubted fact that there were many persons who did not look at these things with the theological acumen of the noble Lord there was great ground for having a less controversial form of religious teaching made the ordinary common procedure of the school, except for parents who wished to withdraw their children from it. The noble Lord seemed to build his argument most specially on the day industrial schools, but when they were dealing with them and with reformatories the segregation had taken place before the school was formed.

LORD R. CECIL: No; not in the ordinary day industrial school.

*MR. ADKINS said the ordinary day industrial school had to deal with a particular type of child who was best dealt with there, and was not left free to go to an ordinary school in the neighbourhood, and, therefore, they were not dealing with the general competition and general access of any child in the neighbourhood, and they were not dealing with the ordinary kind of child. He did not, in this friendly discussion, wish to use any expression which was too polemical, but he would remark that in the day industrial school and in the reformatory the problem was easier, because Nonconformity provided no appreciable quota to the insubordinate or criminal classes. He did not wish to base his support of the Government on any facts of a kind which might be looked upon in a different way. He wished to base his support of the Government on the general ground that Cowper-Templeism had worked well for thirty-five years, and if this compromise was to go through, the feelings of those who supported board schools and council schools through all this period must be considered, and Cowper-Templeism, if not by its defects, by its merits, led less to controversy, and was less connected with the particular interest of religious societies than any other teaching, and, therefore stood on a different footing. There was no reason, therefore, why the general uniform type of Cowper-Temple teaching, which had raised no acute dislike in the schools, should not remain where it was to-day in the ordinary life of the school.

MR. LYTTTELTON said that for his part he could not support this Amendment because, although he quite agreed with the spirit of it, viz., that which dictated that all forms of religion should be admitted, he certainly could not support that part of it which laid it down that in the absence of an expression of opinion from the parent the child should receive no religious education at all. That, he thought, was absolutely inadmissible, and he was sure if hon. Members would consider for a moment, if they placed any value on religious education at all, they would agree that it would be deplorable that the children of the drunkard and the wastrel, who very often grew up to be excellent citizens, should be deprived of that which they specially stood in need. He only got up to say that in order to make his own position perfectly clear, because, although he ventured to disapprove of that portion of the hon. Member's Amendment, he entirely approved of the principle which would give equality between the religions. As to that, he did not wish to add a single word to what had been said by his noble friend behind him or his hon. friend the Member for the University of Oxford.

*MR. VERNEY (Buckinghamshire, N.) said the cardinal distinction which had now been introduced was that in the case of denominational teaching they could only give one kind, but when they came to what he preferred to call fundamental Christian teaching, but which had most unfortunately been called Cowper-Templeism, they could give that concurrently with denominational teaching. Under the present Bill they would have three days a week for fundamental Christian teaching and two days a week for denominational, in both cases by desire of the parents. They were not going to give the child Wesleyan and Church of England teaching, but they were going to take the fundamental Christian teaching and give that for three days a week, and on the top of that came denominational teaching, with which it in no way conflicted but for which it furnished the very best ground. That was the distinction on which the whole compromise and Bill was based on its religious side, and he thought it a fair one. Its fairness had been proved by upwards of thirty-five years successful teaching in the school board and council schools, and on Sunday they had denominational teaching of the kind given in Sunday schools up and down the country concurrently with fundamental Christian teaching given on week-days. Nobody had ever heard one single word in the undenominational teaching against any form of denominationalism, and because there had been that broad basis of fundamental Christianity therefore there had been the great success to which he had alluded, and which had been testified to by many leading churchmen, archbishops, bishops, and by laymen who were loyal churchmen.

MR. FORSTER (Kent, Sevenoaks) said he certainly desired that every child should receive some form of religious education, but he did not think he could support the Amendment, because it struck out of the Bill the first and, he thought, only effective reference to religious education other than Cowper-Templeism, and if it were accepted they should be left without any reference to special religious instruction in the Bill at all. Under those circumstances his hon. friend would see that it was impossible for them to support the Amendment, and he had only risen to make that quite clear.

*MR. NAPIER (Kent, Faversham) said he rose mainly for the purpose of uttering a few words of protest against the statement of his noble friend the Member for Marylebone that under this Bill it was intended, or it ought to be the case, that there should be complete equality with regard to undenominational and denominational religion. After all, they were discussing not so much what ought to take place in the abstract, but what as a matter of fact was the agreement between the President of the Board of Education and the Archbishop of Canterbury. It was true the details of that agreement might not be settled, but certain things were already settled, as they saw by the correspondence which had already passed. It seemed clear from that that the Archbishop of Canterbury did not intend that denominational teaching should be in anything like the same position as undenominational teaching. The Archbishop had already agreed that they should differ, seeing that Church children were to receive Cowper-Temple instruction on three days in the week and Church teaching on two days. Undoubtedly, therefore, denominational teaching was to be on quite a different footing from undenominational. The Archbishop had also agreed that undenominational teaching should be paid for by the State, while denominational teaching was not to be paid for in that way; also that the head teacher should be allowed to give undenominational teaching, and above all that the Cowper-Templeism should be compulsory upon local authorities. In the face of all that, how was it possible to say that it was intended that denominational teaching should have equal advantages with undenominational? What was intended, and what he believed would be carried out, was a right of entry which would be made an effective one and which could be used by every parent who desired it. He did not think it had even been suggested by anyone until that afternoon that Cowper-Templeism and denominational teaching were on the same footing. If he might make an egotistical remark, he might say that all this trouble would have been avoided if the Government had accepted his Amendment that the word "permits" instead of the word "desires" should be inserted in Clause 1. The hon. Member for Oxford University had put forth a most specious proposition which on its face appeared to be fair all round. The hon. Gentleman had said that he was much impressed with the argument of the Attorney-General that unless there was some State form of undenominational religion in the schools a large number of the children of this country would go without any religious instruction at all. That was true. There would be an overwhelming number. Not more than one out of ten of the working classes ever attended a place of worship on Sundays, and although he might say he was a member of a particular denomination because his grandmother or mother was a member of it, everybody knew very well that he was not. The hon. Member for Oxford University saw very clearly that it would not do to say there should not be some normal form of religious instruction, and therefore made the specious suggestion that it should be the duty of the local authority to ascertain from the parents of the children who came to the schools what religion they belonged to. In his opinion that was a most pernicious thing to do. It would only result in cross-examining people who had no religious convictions whatever. It was absurd for the local authority to go out of its way to try and find out what religion the parents wished their children taught, and unless the parents actually came forward and said they desired their children to be brought up in a particular denomination, in his opinion the local authority should put these children with those whose parents were content that they should be taught those common principles of Christianity which underlay all systems of denominational teaching, and without which no denomination could exist.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford) thought that it would be better if the Committee could get rid of the Amendment and proceed to something that was more practicable, because he did not see how the Amendment could become part of the Bill. He took exception to the remarks of the hon. Member for Faversham. He had understood that the hon. Member had been very active in attempting to obtain religious education, but the gist of his arguments now was that nine-tenths of the parents of the children of the country did not care whether their children had any religious education or not.

*MR. NAPIER said he did not intend to say that and hoped he did not say so. What he meant was that nine-tenths of the parents had no bias in favour of any particular denomination.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY said the evidence they had was in an entirely opposite direction, seeing that all the years that these provided schools had been existing there had been a strong bias in favour of the denominational schools which were for some time in a large majority. So far as anybody reading the Bill was concerned, the use of the word "desires" by the parent pointed to equality of treatment, and except for a very acute lawyer he imagined that that would be the understanding arrived at. He personally was strongly in favour of the provisions of the Bill, especially those with regard to the right of entry, but the right of entry, to be made effective, must not suffer from any disadvantageous treatment except the fact that Cowper-Templeism was to be the established, normal, and endowed religion of the schools, while the other religions were unendowed.

*MR. MASSIE (Wiltshire, Cricklade) said from his point of view it would be far more just to put both Cowper-Templeism and denominationalism out of school hours altogether, but as this was a compromise he was going to support it. But he would much regret if one of the results of the compromise were to be to institute a practically compulsory creed register for all the parents in the schools. He would prefer to leave it to the parents to register themselves if they desired.

MR. EVELYN CECIL (Aston Manor) said he could not understand why hon. Members should not recognise the possibility of equality of treatment between Cowper-Templeism and denominationalism. This equality existed in the day industrial schools, the poor law schools, and the military and naval schools of this country, and in no single instance had it given rise to any friction or any difficulty. He could not help greatly regretting that the Government had not been able to proceed upon these lines. They had the instances of its success before them which he had already mentioned, and they had not to go far abroad to see how the same principle succeeded. They had only to go to Germany to see how well that system worked, especially in Bavaria, and there were many other countries in Europe where such facilities worked as well as they did in the day industrial schools. He hoped that the Government would reconsider the matter and adopt some scheme on the lines he had indicated. He quite failed to see his way to support the Amendment. It only provided that religious instruction should be given to a child if the parent desired and asked for it. What was to happen to the child whose parent did not ask for it? He presumed that if the Amendment passed, the child whose parents had failed to make known their wishes would get no religious instruction at all. If that were the case the Amendment created a purely secular basis, and unless parents were active and cared enough, and were religious enough to ask for religious instruction for their children they would not be able to get even Cowper-Temple teaching under the Amendment. Under these circumstances he could not support the Amendment, and he hoped it would be rejected. He welcomed the spirit of conciliation that was abroad and he was sincerely anxious for a settlement, but he was anxious for a settlement on really fair terms. He fully recognised the advance of Christian brotherhood in bonds of peace. They must realise that there must be variety in Christendom, but not, he hoped, disunion.

MR. LLEWELYN WILLIAMS said there was a great deal of misconception on both sides of the House as to the object and effect of this Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, seemed to think that if the Amendment were carried the children of drunkards and wastrels would have no religious education, because their parents were not likely to ask that such teaching should be given. But the right hon. Gentleman had apparently forgotten that unless the parent did apply that his child should receive religious instruction he could not get it as the Bill stood. In Clause 1, subsection (b) the parent must ask for religious instruction to be given. In the subsection of Clause 2, also, the parent must ask for religious teaching. So that there was really no point in what the right hon. Gentleman said with regard to the children of wastrels. His hon. friends sitting around him seemed to think that his hon. friend who had moved the Amendment was against Cowper-Temple teaching. For himself, he supported the Amendment, and he had never said a word against Cowper-Temple teaching in his life. Cowper-Temple teaching had done very well during the last thirty-eight years. What he objected to was not the character of the teaching but the fact that it was paid for out of public funds, and the object of the Amendment was to reduce Cowper-Temple teaching to the same position under the Bill as denominational teaching, namely, that it should be given in school hours by the teachers if they liked to volunteer, but that the expense of giving that Cowper-Temple teaching should fall not on the community, many of whom objected to it, or did not believe in it, but on those persons or those religious organisations who did believe in it. He had always been taught that this was the old Nonconformist and Liberal position. It was a position which had never been departed from as far as he knew except at the instance of members of the Church of England, and Nonconformists all over the country had gradually conceded, for the sake of peace, the giving of Cowper-Temple teaching in the schools, not because they wanted it, but because they were afraid, or unwilling, to pay for it out of their own pockets. They wanted to come to some sort of settlement of the religious difficulty in the schools. In Carmarthen under the Act of 1870, every school in the county was a secular school, and no religious teaching of any sort or kind was given in it. Not that religious education was not wanted. There were more scholars to-day in the Sunday schools of Wales than in the day schools, and it was absurd to say, therefore, that they were in favour of secular education because they did not care for religion. They did not have religious teaching in the schools because they did not want to have religion discredited by its being taught by people who did not believe in it. The only way to teach religion was by having it taught by people who believed in it, and who were ready to sacrifice themselves to teach to others the religion which they loved, and not because it was part of their employment, or that it helped to keep discipline in the school, or because it furthered their worldly aims. He ventured to say that no real religion could be taught by people who were inspired by such motives. It was only by people who felt deeply that which they taught that the true interests of religion and of education could be advanced. Nonconformists, unfortunately for themselves, had been lured step by step from an impregnable position for the sake of peace. He was sorry to say that hon. Gentlemen around him had now come to believe in established and endowed religion. These discussions had raised many paradoxes, and it was especially paradoxical to hear hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House speaking in favour of the establishment and endowment of one form of religion. The objection to Cowper-Temple teaching was not to its character, but to the fact that it was given in school hours; for his part he abandoned that part of his secular opinion in view of the difficulties which existed, but what he did object to was that it should be paid for out of the rates and public funds.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said the question which the hon. Member was discussing did not arise on this Amendment.

MR. LLEWELYN WILLIAMS said he was obliged to the Deputy-Chairman for letting him deal with it so far, and he would not pursue it further. He hoped that his hon. friend behind him would carry his Amendment to a division and give them this one last chance of entering their protest against the unfairness to those who did not approve of Cowper-Temple teaching, and to those who did not believe in that teaching being paid for out of public funds. He hoped that they would get the support of those who voted for a similar Amendment two years ago, and of his hon. friend the Member for West Bromwich, who was willing to die in the last ditch on the question of the right of entry, which, while other points of the Bill might be matters of expediency, was one of the vital principles. He hoped that when they got into the division lobby his hon. friend behind him would be supported not by sixty-three as the hon. Member was two years ago, but by such a phalanx of Liberals and Nonconformists, together he hoped, with gentlemen on the other side of the House who believed that Cowper-Templeism should be placed on an equality with denominational teaching in the schools, that at last they would have a solid expression of opinion from that House in favour of the only possible solution, in the long run, of this difficulty, namely, the secular solution.

MR. HUDSON (Newcastle-on-Tyne) said that after what had fallen from the Attorney-General he could not refrain from saying a word or two on this important matter. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said: "Why disturb the harmony which already exists with regard to Cowper-Temple teaching in the provided schools." The fact was that they were disturbing it by this so-called bargain. They were completely upsetting the harmony which existed to-day, and that was their objection. There was only one logical way, and that was to give complete equality all round. He had been among the working classes all his life, and, though in his district they were not irreligious, he said emphatically that if they were left alone not 10 per cent. of them would ask for religious teaching of any kind in primary schools. Yet in his district they would find the Sunday schools crowded with children of the very parents who would not think of asking for religious teaching in the day schools. It was utterly impossible to settle this question by having what was called a State endowed system. It had never been endowed up to now, and why endow it now? There was no single indication that this difficulty would be any nearer settlement when this Bill went through than there had been for many years.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: Order, order. These observations are too general. They ought to be confined to the Amendment.

MR. HUDSON said he did not want to run counter to the ruling of the Chair, and he would conclude by saying that when the hon. Member went to a division he should be very pleased to support him.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs) said the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Carmarthen had appealed to his hon. friend the Member for West Bromwich as a last ditcher, and to do his hon. friend the Member for West Bromwich justice, he was the very man who would die in the last ditch for a cause. But he thought that earlier in the afternoon the hon. Member for Carmarthen was engaged in exhibiting himself rather as a hedger than as a ditcher. Being prepared to defend his own vote on a straight issue he did rather think that the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman just now was somewhat at variance with the hedger speech which he had made earlier in the day. But, in spite of that, there was a great deal of truth in what he said about Wales and education, when he stated that the Welsh might with less harm adopt the secular solution, because their Sunday schools were crowded, while England had not got her Sunday schools developed to the same extent. ["Oh."] He did not wish to appear to be over-proud of Wales, but he did think that the Sunday schools were developed to an extent in Wales that few people were prepared to argue that they were developed in England. However, he did not wish to exalt the Welsh case, which was strong enough to stand on its own merits. An hon. Member had remarked that Cowper-Templeism was a good enough religion for anybody. He understood that fundamental Christianity and Cowper-Templeism were identical; therefore, if fundamental Christianity was good enough for everybody, Cowper-Templeism was good enough for everybody. The religious feelings of other people, however, must be respected. He thought Cowper-Templeism was most admirable training, but he regarded it as general moral training and not as a religion. Let the hon. Member for Buckinghamshire ask any Roman Catholic, for instance, who held to the traditions of his Church, to the continuous discipline and dogma that had been handed down, generation after generation. Such an one would regard Cowper-Templeism as an undermining of denomination, and not as a denomination of itself. So might any member of the Anglican Church, or any other Church. It was not a position that was arguable. In this religious question they must allow each denomination and even individuals to have their views. They were not Japanese, who could send delegates round the world to decide which was the most suitable religion without any regard to the inherited traditions and feelings of generations. He thought the hon. Member was unduly dogmatic in his pronouncement upon this matter, and though Cowper-Templeism was full of merits, he held it to be a most admirable system rather corresponding with Confucianism in China as a State code of morals—

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN called the hon. Member to order.

MR. REES said he understood he was not to enter into any general remarks on the nature of Cowper-Templeism in Committee and he would of course abstain. So far as he could understand, to accept the Amendment would be to strike out the provision practically of any other form of religion but Cowper-Templeism, as a matter of course, and in the absence of a special demand by the parent. It would be to make mincemeat of this portion of the Bill, and would be altogether to deprive it of its significance. In spite of the appeal of the hon. Member for Carmarthen, who seemed very positive about it, he hoped the Amendment would have very little support. He had jotted down some notes during the speeches of other hon. Members, which were more discursive than that which he had been fortunate enough to be permitted to make, but it would be more respectful to the Chairman's ruling to make no further observations of a general character.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) said the most important point which had been discussed on the Amendment was whether Cowper-Templeism was to occupy a favoured position as compared with denominational teaching. He most earnestly protested, on behalf of his constituents, against the assertion that Cowper-Temple or any other teaching should be given preference over other forms of religious instruction. It seemed to him that the only fair-minded way to approach the subject—the way which he should have thought all hon. Members who called themselves Liberals would adopt—would be to say: "If you are going to have religious teaching in the schools, all religious teaching and teachers must be put on the same footing, on a basis of equality," because if they did not do that surely it was impossible to imagine for a moment that this so-called compromise would stand. They had heard from the hon. Members for Bethnal Green and North-West Norfolk that this was only a sort of temporary settlement. They all hoped, even those who disliked the Bill in its present form, that the prophecies of these two hon. Members would not come true, but if Cowper-Temple teaching was to be endowed by the State and made a State religion, and Anglicanism, Roman Catholicism and Wesleyanism were to be made fashionable extras to be paid for by the denominations, it was absolutely impossible that this should be a permanent settlement, or that the great county of Lancashire would submit for a moment to a settlement on those lines. He asked hon. Members to consider the feelings of the managers and trustees of the thousands of voluntary schools in the single-school areas all over the country. Up to now these Church schools had been saturated with an Anglican atmosphere, though perhaps the Catechism and the Apostles Creed had been taught only one day a week, and on the other days of the week the children had been taught to become in their future lives good Church men and women. The whole object of the schools which had been built by these denominations, very often at great privations to themselves, was that their children should become of the same faith as themselves. Under this subsection they were given a right of entry on two days of the week in exchange for the five days they were giving up. These people, who were the majority of the parents, were to enter on two days of the week, and the minority, who had not spent a penny towards building the schools, were to have their own religious persuasion taught five days a week at the expense of the State. It was not fair or just, and it was impossible that a settlement could be built up on those lines. He warned hon. Members, from what he had heard from Lancashire, that if the Bill was passed in this form it would not be a reality, the schools would not be handed over without scenes of disorder, and unless they met the Anglicans and Roman Catholics in a more reasonable spirit this compromise could never stand.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood) said he only wanted to ask a question arising out of a statement which had startled him in the speech of the hon. Member for Carmarthen. The hon. Member said that under the Bill, in the case of a child whose parent was so apathetic or irreligious as to make no demand for any religious instruction, such a child would get no religious instruction at all. On looking through the Bill that appeared to be so. If it was true, it knocked the bottom out of the argument of the Attorney-General, and it would enlighten great masses of people in the country with regard to the real character of the Bill. Three-quarters of an hour was to be set aside for religious instruction for children whose parents desired that the child should receive that instruction. It appeared to follow that if the parent did not express his desire under those regulations, no religious instruction of any kind, Cowper-Temple or other, could be given. They ought to be informed if that was so, and, if it was not so, why not.

MR. ESSEX (Gloucestershire, Cirencester) said he was one of those who felt that the spirit permeating this Bill was of profound importance, and would have a great deal of effect in tempering the attitude of the persons who would have to carry it out on the whole question of religion. He was extremely sorry to find moved by his hon. friend an Amendment which seemed to make for the secularism of the school. He would be glad to be corrected if he was mistaken. As he read the Amendment it made out that only in those cases where a child's parents asked for religious teaching it should be the duty of the authority to give it. He felt that owing to the action of the closure they had not an opportunity for discussing the provisions of the clause, and it had now come to this, that if the first clause became operative they would have to apply for any religious teaching, however small its quantity, or they would get none.

SIR W. J. COLLINS: That does not arise in consequence of my Amendment. It may be so in the Bill as it is drafted.

MR. ESSEX said fearlessly that if it went out to the country that the Bill laid it down as a cardinal principle that only those parents who were industrious enough to ask for some religious instruction would have the satisfaction of knowing that their children had it, the Bill was doomed to failure. Every man amongst them was moved by a desire that his child should be taught in the day schools of the country the underlying principles of morality to which not a man of them did not pay honour. He wanted to break a light lance with the hon. Member for Blackpool. The hon. Member, like a good many more, hurt the feelings of simple-minded Nonconformists like himself when he suggested that this, which they hoped and begged must be the irreducible minimum of teaching in the schools, Cowper-Temple teaching, was the religion of the Nonconformist. Emphatically that was not so. But the hon. Member for Blackpool placed it in direct competition and contrast with Anglicanism, Roman Catholicism, and Wesleyanism. Cowper-Templeism, which they wanted to be the normal irreducible minimum, was what they, as Nonconformists, conceded to their Church friends, hoping they could at least agree upon that, that the children might understand in that and be taught in that all that their intellects at the time of elementary education were capable of assimilating, and that when they began to branch off from that common basis of simple elements into Roman Catholicism or Wesleyanism, into the creed of the Baptist, the Unitarian, and the rest, they had arrived at a time when the children were no longer in the schools. In short, they could understand the common basis, but when the time came for differentiation between the various colours and textures of these more developed creeds based upon that common basis they had left school. If he was right in that, his hon. friends ought to support this Amendment. There were in his own division eighty single-school areas. He believed that the majority of them desired some religious teaching, but many of the parents would hesitate before taking upon themselves the choosing or indicating of the exact formula or syllabus of religious instruction they required for their children. If he had been in the House of Commons six or eight years ago he would have been found supporting the hon. Member for Burnley in his secular solution, but he would not dare to do that to-day with his knowledge of rural divisions. He had had all his own children educated by Church people, and, Nonconformist as he was, he would sooner have his children educated by Roman Catholics than have them go without any religious education at all. He hoped his Roman Catholic friends would move along those lines.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil) pointed out that if this Amendment were carried, it would merely be a repetition of the First Lord's Amendment.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk) hoped the President of the Board of Education would give them an answer to the questions put to him. It certainly seemed to him that the hon. Member who spoke last had expressed the true view of the Amendment. He would like to know whether it was the fact that no child would receive religious instruction in the school unless the parent expressed a wish that it should receive such instruction. The clause really ought to be amended so as to read in the negative, and the child ought to receive the religious instruction unless the parent expressed a desire in the opposite direction.

MR. RUNCIMAN said he had already explained that it was the intention of the Government to leave Cowper-Temple teaching in exactly the same position in which it now was. In all the provided schools of the country Cowper-Temple teaching was given to the children in the school with the exception of those whose parents desired that they should be withdrawn. It was the intention of the Government not to alter the provision of religious teaching in so far as that was concerned.

MR. ASHLEY asked what the position of denominational instruction would be.

MR. RUNCIMAN said the child would not get specific religious instruction if the parent did not ask for it. The child would get Cowper-Temple teaching unless the parent asked that the child should be withdrawn. That teaching really did not supersede, or run in antagonism to, or in any way prevent, purely denominational instruction. When they talked about Cowper-Temple instruction they ought to remember that in the non-provided schools it was the same kind of religious instruction as that which was given on four days of the week, and it was of such a kind as not to prevent its being made a foundation for a superstructure of purely denominational instruction.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said he only rose to make sure that he understood the position as it had just been declared by the President of the Board of Education. He understood it was the intention of the Government that the normal instruction to every child whose parents expressed no wish one way or the other should be what was called Cowper-Temple teaching, but a parent might express a wish that his child should have no religious teaching at all. He took it if, on looking into Clause 1, the Government found the wording did not carry out that intention, they would themselves put down Amendments on the Report stage making it clear.

MR. RUNCIMAN: Yes, it is our intention to make that quite clear.

*MR. P. BARLOW (Bedford) said his hon. friend had appealed to those who voted against the right of entry to support the Amendment. He could not imagine on what possible grounds that appeal could be made, because it seemed to him that the result of the Amendment would be not to limit the right of entry, but to extend it to five days a week, and also to extend denominational instruction to every child on every one of those five days a week. This was supposed to be an agreed Bill, and the majority of Nonconformists had endeavoured to take a broad and open view of the situation. They had consented to support the compromise because of its being a possible agreement upon a question which had so long disturbed the education of the country. The two days right of entry was one of the points upon which they found it most difficult to support the Bill. He stood in the position of having put this very point before two public meetings in his constituency, and so far from finding any objection either from Nonconformists or Churchmen, he had to say to the Committee that he did not hear at either of those meetings one single word in condemnation of the Bill as a whole. The opinion was that they desired a settlement to be arrived at as soon as possible, and they believed that this measure provided a basis of settlement which would put an end to this disastrous controversy, and they agreed with him in supporting the Government in their effort to bring this compromise to a satisfactory conclusion.

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS (Denbigh District) said he was not quite satisfied with the explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill in regard to undenominational teaching. Was he right in assuming that the sole difference between undenominational teaching, as given at present in the council schools, and as it would be given under the Bill, was that whereas under the existing state of things a council might in its discretion decline to give any religious instruction at all, under the Bill the council would be deprived of that discretion, and would be compelled to give the religious instruction? That was his first point. His second was in regard to the right of entry. He would like to know whether, if a parent belonging to any denomination whatsoever desired that his child should be given instruction in the tenets of that denomination, facilities must be provided. He was not quite certain whether that was to be an absolute right, or a right qualified by considerations of convenience as determined by the local authority or the religious instruction committee. For instance, had a Mahomedan parent the right to demand special instruction for his child in that religion? He was in a great difficulty about this point, because he did not know whether the right was absolute, or whether the council or religious instruction committee had a right to say who should or should not give such instruction. He presumed that a teacher of the Church of England would be perfectly entitled to teach the children of members of the Church of England the doctrines contained in the thirty-nine Articles. He supposed it would be quite in order for such a teacher to teach the doctrine of the thirty-eighth Article. If a teacher of the Church of England could go into a school and teach the particular doctrines of that Church, would it be open to the members of the Socialist group, for example, to claim the right—

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said the Committee having decided on the Amendment to leave out subsection (1) of this clause that religious instruction was to be given and that facilities were to be provided for such instruction, hon. Members must now confine themselves to the specific Amendment before the Committee.

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS said if that was so he must accept the ruling, but it was very important to know exactly what was proposed before one was called upon to vote on this particular provision which involved the right of entry.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: May I point out that by rejecting the Amendment to leave out subsection (1) the Committee has already decided the principle of the right to receive religious instruction, of a character different from that to be given under Clause 1 (2) (b) and also the duty of the local education authority to provide accommodation for such religious instruction. The Committee is now only dealing with matters of detail to carry out that principle, and cannot go back on the principle which has been determined by that vote.

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS said that was precisely what he understood. He thought they had now a right to discuss the details and ascertain from the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill precisely what the proposal involved.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: These details the hon. Member refers to will fall to be discussed under subsection (6).

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS called attention to the words proposed to be left out, and said that they all knew what was the character of the religious instruction to be given under the Education Act of 1870. What he was not sure about was the precise character of the religious instruction which might be given under this Bill.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: That question arose on the proposal to leave out the subsection.

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS said that they only decided the general principle on the question to leave out the subsection. Here they were discussing a very important point of detail. He was anxious that no undue time should be occupied in discussing these matters, but they were really of vital importance. It had been represented to him that day that clergymen of the Church of England, who, having acted illegally, would be prohibited from teaching if the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commission were carried into effect, might be allowed to go and teach in the schools. He wished to know from the right hon. Gentleman whether that was so or not. He had the impression from what the right hon. Gentleman said at a meeting of Nonconformists in the early stages of the negotiations that it was intended strictly to limit the right of entry to denominations to two days a week.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: That comes under subsection (2).

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS said he would not trespass further on that point. He desired to say that local authorities with experience in the administration of education had very considerable objection to the right of entry. He would like to call the attention of the Committee to an important resolution which was passed.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: Order, order. The duty of the local education authority in this matter is provided for in subsection (6).

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS said he would not press his point beyond reading the Resolution. It was passed at Llandrindod Wells some time ago and affected the whole Welsh community,

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: I do not see what that has to do with the present Amendment. I have repeatedly called the hon. Member to order.

*MR. MADDISON (Burnley) said the Amendment raised a clear issue, whether Cowper-Temple teaching and denominational teaching should be put on an equal footing out of school hours. He regretted that the hon. Member for Gloucester should again, after repeated protests and repudiations, speak of his hon. friend the Member for St. Pancras as endeavouring to enforce secularism. This was no effort of organised secularists to keep their activities confined to affairs of this world without recognising a life beyond. It was unfair to those who supported the secular solution of the education question that they should be constantly obliged to make these protests. What they desired by the Amendment was to keep the school period altogether clear from the entanglement, embarrassment, and bickering that followed the giving of religious instruction as part of the curriculum.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: The Committee has already decided by the vote to leave out subsection (1) that religious instruction is to be given.

*MR. MADDISON said that if this Amendment was in order at all, it was surely competent for him to say that the instruction should be given outside of the school hours altogether.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: The subsection as amended, if this Amendment were carried, would still provide for religious instruction being given. The Amendment would not have been in order otherwise, because it would have been antagonistic to the decision of the Committee. The time within which such religious instruction might be given would arise later under subsection (2).

MR. MADDISON said the hon. Member for West St. Pancras would probably consult the convenience of the House by not going to a division on the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

LORD R. CECIL moved to amend the clause by omitting the words "it is open to the local education authority to give in accordance with subsection (2) of Section 14 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870," and inserting in their place the words "the local authority gives, or proposes to give in such school." He thought the Amendment was one which the Government might accept. It was really an improvement on the drafting of the Bill, and made quite clear what the subsection actually meant. The clause, as it stood, gave the parent the right to demand special religious instruction provided that he demanded instruction—

"Of a character different from that which it is open to the local education authority to give, in accordance with subsection (2) of Section 14 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870."

That was to say, the parent was to get for his child the religious instruction demanded and which was incapable of being given under the Cowper-Temple clause. He did not think that the Government could mean that. He did not believe it had ever been decided how far they could give denominational instruction under the Cowper-Temple clause. What would happen if the parent was not satisfied with what was known as the London County Council syllabus or with the instruction ordinarily given in the school which his child attended under the Cowper-Temple clause? He ventured to think that some such words as he proposed in his Amendment would be an improvement on the drafting of the Bill; would describe the intention of the Government better than those used in the clause; and would, to some extent, further the execution of the wishes of those parents who genuinely objected to the instruction ordinarily given in the schools. He could not think that the Government would object to the principle of the Amendment, and he hoped that they would so far meet him as to accept it. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 22, to leave out from the word 'which' to the second word 'the,' in line 24, and to insert the words 'the local education authority gives or proposes to give in such school.'"—(Lord R. Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part."

SIR W. ROBSON said that he hoped to convince the noble Lord that the words in the Bill were the best to carry out the purpose intended. This was not merely a question of drafting, but a question of substance. As the Bill stood, a local authority might give Cowper-Temple instruction, or permit the right of entry in order that a particular kind of instruction might be given. It might be that some parents would say that they did not want Anglican instruction, Catholic instruction, or any denominational instruction for their children; that they were quite content with Cowper-Temple instruction, but that they did not want the particular Cowper-Temple instruction which was given in that particular school. The effect of this clause would be to enable the local authorities to decline to meet such a request. A demand for a particular kind of denominational instruction could be made under the Bill; but the measure did not permit, so far as Cowper-Templeism itself was concerned, the parents to analyse and divide it so that they could demand a large number of different kinds of religious instruction being given. There must be a certain degree of generality observed with regard to Cowper-Temple instruction. To have such a variety might lead to so many class-rooms being occupied for different kinds of Cowper-Temple instruction, that the working of the right of entry would be interfered with.

SIR PHILIP MAGNUS asked whether the Bill contained any definition of Cowper-Templeism.

SIR W. ROBSON said that the Bill did not assume to define it. The phrase was very well understood; and he did not think it would be very desirable to define it in the Bill.

MR. JAMES HOPE said he would like to have a clear understanding of this point. Supposing they had a local authority giving Cowper-Temple instruction in the simple form of Bible-reading, and that some parents were dissatisfied with it, saying that they wanted the Apostles' Creed, or the Ten Commandments taught; would it or would it not be competent for the parents to go a little further and ask for the teaching of some catechism or some form of religious teaching common to many denominations?

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich): Will the hon. Member say whether the Ten Commandments are in the Bible or not?

MR. JAMES HOPE: Yes.

MR. CROOKS: One would imagine they were not from what some hon. Members said.

MR. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans) asked the hon. and learned Gentleman to elucidate the conditions under which this clause could be applied where, in a school in a large borough, Cowper-Temple teaching took the form of reading passages of Scripture without note or comment. If a denominational school in that borough were to pass over to the local education authority, would that local education authority be allowed to set up Cowper-Temple teaching according to their own ideas? If so, the result would be that there would be only a reading of passages of Scripture, but no questions would be permitted to be asked by the pupils and no explanation given by the teacher.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: How does the hon. Member connect that with the Amendment before the Committee?

MR. CARLILE said that they were surely entitled to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman how this clause in the Bill would be worked. Apparently it would result in Church children getting no religious instruction except in two days in the week.

LORD R. CECIL said that what the answer of the Attorney-General came to was that all the boasted security, on which certain well-meaning people had built their support of the Bill, that there should be some Bible teaching in the school was absolutely non-existent. [MINISTERIAL cries of "No."] There was nothing to prevent the education authority giving any kind of religious or non-religious instruction, but if some undenominational parents went to the education authority and said: "We do not desire to be put under the sectarian heel of the clergy of any denomination, but we do desire simple Bible teaching, the elements of Christianity," the local education authority would be bound to reply: "We cannot meet your wishes at all. You can, if you say you are Church of England or Roman Catholic, have special religious instruction, but if you merely want the elements of the Christian faith, you cannot have it." He was quite ready to withdraw his Amendment, but he hoped hon. Members who supported the Bill would observe what was the result of this legislation.

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS said that this Amendment raised a very important point indeed. In the Preston case it was expressly held that the Athanasian Creed might be lawfully taught under the 1870 Act, and under the Cockerton judgment—

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: The Amendment does not raise that question at all. Is it the pleasure of the Committee that the Amendment be withdrawn?

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS thought he would not be out of order if he asked a definite expression of opinion on this point from the Attorney-General.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: A question cannot be asked relating to a matter outside the scope of the Amendment.

MR. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry) said that it was quite a common case that the local authority might decide that Cowper-Temple teaching amounted only to reading the Bible and looking up difficult words in the dictionary. But supposing a considerable number of parents wanted more—

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: That has nothing to do with the Amendment, which simply proposes to leave out certain descriptive or contrasting words in the clause, and substitute other words. As the clause stands it provides for a child receiving religious instruction of a character different from that which "it is open to the local education authority to give in accordance with subsection (2) of Section 14 of the Act, 1870." The Amendment is to leave out those descriptive words and to substitute the words "the local authority gives or proposes to give in such school. The religious instruction to be given by the local authority is already defined under Clause 1 (2) (b) as "(not being in contravention of subsection (2) of Section 14 of the Act of 1870)," and the merits of that religion are not open to re-discussion.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON said he thought the Chairman was assuming that Cowper-Temple teaching was necessarily all of one sort. He submitted that so long as catechisms and formularies were not used the teaching given under the Cowper-Temple clause might be entirely denominational. The Amendment pointed out that the parent might object to one sort of Cowper-Temple teaching when he might not object to another. That was a substantial distinction.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said that that was so, but such a question would have to be raised under Clause 1. The present Amendment dealt with the substitution of certain words for those in the Bill and the propriety of such substitution.

MR. BRIDGEMAN said, with respect, that he was not raising a general question, but the special question of the very words of the Amendment. He said that in many schools the local authority gave what would come under the Cowper-Temple clause, but which was merely reading the Bible and picking out the difficult words in the dictionary. That was a totally different thing from what was regarded by hon. Members opposite as simple Bible teaching under the Cowper-Temple clause, and which the Minister for Education said was actually given three days a week already in nearly all the voluntary schools. Supposing a large number of parents said they wanted Cowper-Temple teaching without formulæ and without creeds, but that they did not think it was any good merely having the Bible read and not explained at all, they were entirely excluded from any choice for their children unless they accepted teaching which went a great deal further than what they liked. That seemed to him to be a gross injustice.

SIR W. ROBSON said that undoubtedly the parents who desired Cowper-Temple teaching must take the Cowper-Temple teaching provided by the local authority; if they desired a different kind of Cowper-Temple teaching they must operate through the local authority; they must change the local authority. He was quite sure that hon. Members opposite would not desire that every parent should dictate to the local authority the precise form of Cowper-Temple teaching, or require, if the local authority did not meet his wishes, that he should have special accommodation provided for him as though he represented a different denomination. To give that right to the parents would very seriously hamper the facilities available. He thought the words of the Bill were those which were the best calculated to avoid possible difficulties.

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS asked, if the remedy when parents were dissatisfied with the particular form of Cowper-Temple teaching given was to change the local authority, how he proposed it could be done in the case of the non-elective religious instruction committee.

SIR W. ROBSON said the hon. Member had put the question of electoral contingencies, which was hardly relevant to the point before them.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil) said he regretted he could not put his Amendment on the Paper, owing to the great hurry in which the Bill had been brought forward. The Amendment was very simple in form, if far-reaching in character. It was to leave out the word "shall" and insert the word "may," so as to leave the discretion to the local authority as to whether they should provide accommodation for special religious instruction or not. The Government claimed that they had never deviated from the two fundamental principles upon which their policy was based—the one being popular control in all State-aided schools, and the other no tests for teachers. He maintained that in this clause they had offended grievously against both these principles. As to the first, they had already, in the name of popular control, taken away the discretion of the local authority, which they always hitherto possessed, as to whether they would give Cowper-Temple teaching or not, and now they went a step further and insisted that the local authorities should, whether they liked it or not, give sectarian teaching. At present, in the council schools, in which after all the bulk of the children of this country were educated, there was no teaching of this kind at all; but under the Bill, in the name of popular control, the Government insisted that the local authorities should give it, whether they liked it or not. He hoped that even now the Government might see their way to comply with his proposal, so that their claim that they had never deviated from the principle of popular control should be well founded.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 25, to leave out the word 'shall,' and insert the word 'may.'"—(Mr. D. A. Thomas.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'shall' stand part of the clause."

Mr. RUNCIMAN said his hon. friend had contended that the clause provided that the local education authority should give sectarian teaching, but he would like to point out that it provided nothing of the kind. It merely conferred facilities for other people to give such teaching his best to preserve the equipoise arrived at. He knew that the right of entry, as it was called, was a very grave educational evil, and he was one of those who regarded the interests of education as far more important than the religious wranglings which had occupied the House in discussing this and other Bills. Anyone who had had experience of education—and he had served for three years on the Education Committee of the London County Council—not only knew that the right of entry was an intolerable nuisance, but also that the parents cared very little about it. A compromise had been arrived at between what the Leader of the Opposition had described as the high contracting parties; he did not know who they were, but he knew that that was the language appropriate to international law in the case of the sovereigns of independent States, and it seemed to him a description singularly inapplicable to the parties to this so-called compromise. He would rather liken the contending forces to two rival commercial houses who had been endeavouring for many years to supply the entire public demand. Having failed to get that, they had arrived at a compromise, or, as he would rather call it, in trade terms, a combine. Now the essence of the combine was this, that in order to regulate competition and to reduce working expenses and diminish friction, each firm should have the opportunity of supplying its own brand to certain classes of customers. As happened in most combines, the customer had not been consulted at all. The customer in this case was the parent, and the parent did not care a rap, generally speaking, which of the particular brands the whole business. They were imposing by this clause on the local authority the obligation to supply any brand of religion which any busybody might induce any parent to demand. He could not describe the proposal as anything less than foolishness. He welcomed this Amendment to restrict the area. If carried, it would leave it open to the local authorities to decide whether they would or would not supply that denominational education which everybody knew was very little required by the parents and the supply of which would disturb and upset the administration of the school. He had pleasure in seconding the Amendment.

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS, in support of the Amendment, said that the people of Wales believed in the principle of local option, and although they had not succeeded in getting it in another Bill which had passed this House, that was no reason why they should not attempt to obtain it in this Bill. The Church Congress of Wales had taken a definite stand upon this matter. At a conference called to consider what amendments should be made to the Act of 1902, they carried a resolution unanimously to accept no amendment to the Education Act which did not prevent the right of entry for sectarian teaching during school hours. Upon that official and definite declaration of the Church Congress of Wales he took his stand. It represented the real spirit and desire of the Welsh people in a way which had not been presented by the majority of the Welsh Party in this House.

MR. CARLILE opposed the Amendment. He thought from the speeches of the three Members who had supported it that it was not the intention of many people that the provisions of this Bill should be made real. If these rules were illusory, and the local authorities were allowed to put all sorts of difficulties in the way of this instruction being given, and no machinery was put into the Bill to prevent them, then the concession was worthless. He regretted that that tone should be taken up by Members opposite, as it was quite inconsistent with what the Prime Minister and other Ministers had said, and confirmed the impression among those with whom he sat that it was not intended that these things should be real, but, on the contrary, that they should be sapped, undermined, and made absolutely worthless.

*MR. ADKINS said that he, for one, intended to be perfectly loyal to the right of entry given in the clause and he protested against the suggestions of the last speaker which were quite unjustified. If the matter were left to local option, it would facilitate the worst kind of controversy in the election of local authorities. Those who had had to do with local work were most anxious that administration should be as free as possible from acute controversial matter. If the right of entry was part of the settlement to be carried out in good faith and feeling, it was surely better that it should be statutory so that people concerned might know their obligations.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
D. A. Thomas and Mr.
Clement Edwards.

*MR. CAVE said the Amendment he wished to move had to be read in conjunction with a consequential Amendment later on the Paper. The effect of the two together would be that, when a proper demand for special religious instruction was made, the authority would be bound to provide suitable accommodation for the child to receive that instruction on two mornings in the week. He did not speak as a supporter of the Bill. He did not vote for the Second Reading, and he could not possibly vote for the Bill in its present shape; but, in common with other Members, he was watching to see whether the Government carried out their declaration, and made the right of entry a reality. This was one of several Amendments put down on the Paper to enable the Government to carry out that declaration. The Bill at present provided that, when a parent desired that his child should receive special religious instruction, the authority should make available any accommodation in the schoolhouse which could reasonably be made so available. They had, however, to read those words in connection with subsection (6) of this clause. That subsection provided that, in considering whether accommodation was available, the authority should take into account a number of circumstances. There were no less than four different matters which the authority were required to take into account, viz., the number of children or groups of children requiring religious instruction, the proportion of those children in each case to the total number of children in the school, the number of persons available to give that instruction, and the manner in which the classrooms in the schoolhouse could be most conveniently and advantageously used. There were, therefore, under the Bill as it stood any number of objections which might be raised to the demand for special religious instruction. It would be perfectly easy for a reluctant authority, acting no doubt in a bona fide manner, to find within the four corners of the clause many reasons for not providing accommodation for special religious instruction. He wanted to make that impossible. He did not want the giving of special religious instruction to be conditional on a number of matters which the authority might decide one way or the other. He wanted it made imperative upon the authority to provide accommodation. He had put down an Amendment for that purpose so that, when the demand was made in proper form, the authority should be required to provide suitable accommodation for the purpose. He had only heard one objection to this proposal, and that was that the effect of the words might be that the authority might have to build and add to their premises. He did not think that would arise. If there was room in the school for the giving of secular instruction, surely it would be possible by a little goodwill on the part of the authorities to find room for the giving of the different kinds of religious instruction. He would not object to a reasonable minimum to the number of parents requiring special religious instruction so that they should not have a demand for one or two children; but he felt sure that with a little goodwill it would always be possible to find room. He moved his Amendment with the genuine intention of having it embodied in the Bill if possible. He thought it pointed out a real danger in the way of the smooth working of the Bill, and he hoped either it or something of equivalent value would be given.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 25, after the word 'shall,' to insert the words 'provide suitable accommodation.'"—(Mr. Cave.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RUNCIMAN said the hon. and learned Member had pointed out a very serious flaw in his own Amendment. It put on the authority the obligation to erect special premises if it could not provide accommodation in the existing premises for denominational instruction. The same point arose earlier in the afternoon, and in a conversation across the floor of the House, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Worcester obtained a statement from the Prime Minister to the effect that in so far as any difficulty arose under the subsection they would do their best to remove it. The right hon. Gentleman had provided him with a copy of his suggested Amendment, and he thought it would cover the hon. and learned Member's point, whilst it would not put on the authority the obligation to erect new premises, which, he presumed, the hon. and learned Member would not put forward. The subsection, if the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman were incorporated, would read as follows: "The authority shall, for the purpose of enabling that child to receive that instruction on two mornings in the week, make suitable accommodation in the schoolhouse available, unless they satisfy the Board of Education that that accommodation cannot reasonably be so made available without making structural alterations or additions to the schoolhouse." The Government had considered the Amendment carefully and would be prepared to accept it. It would, he thought, do all the hon. and learned Member desired in the proposal he made.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said that, as his hon. friend the Member for Marylebone observed at an earlier stage, he could make no claim to speak for anyone but himself. He thought that he was in the same position as most hon. Members in that respect. He was much obliged to the Government for the way in which they had met him. It appeared to him that the clause as it stood put all the onus of proving that accommodation was available on the parent who desired special religious instruction for his child. He wished to transfer the onus of proof on to the authority that there was not such accommodation, and that was what the Amendment which the Government had consented to accept did. That was a substantial concession, for which he was grateful to the Government. They recognised that it was the duty of the local authority to provide this accommodation if it possibly could without having to erect new buildings; and it placed upon them the obligation, if they refused to provide the accommodation, of proving that their refusal arose out of their inability to make suitable accommodation. He wished to make one other observation, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not think him ungenerous after the way in which he had met him. He agreed that this subsection had to be read in connection with subsection (6). He had read subsection (6) very carefully, and it did, he thought, complicate the matter; but he did not agree with his hon. and learned friend that the object of the subsection was to throw obstacles in the way of parents. He took it the intention was rather in the opposite direction, and that it was meant to give better security against unnecessary obstacles being placed in the way of parents exercising their rights. He hoped they might reach that subsection in time to discuss it, because he thought it was very important they should do so. He believed if they did, they would come to something like a general agreement. In accepting, so far as he was concerned, the concession the Government had made on subsection (1) they ought not to be precluded from raising the same question on subsection (6) when they came to it.

Mr. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash) said that if this alteration was made there ought to be some limitation as to the number of children for whom accommodation was made. The number thirty had been suggested, but most of them thought that was too many. It had been pointed out by a Liberal friend of his that if every parent chose to demand special instruction for his own child, that might be made a means of wrecking the right of entry. It had also been suggested that this might be a possible means for hostile local authorities to wreck the Bill. He did not suggest that such a thing would be done, but in order to remove the possibility of its being attempted, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider the possibility of putting in some such limitation, and thus make it very much easier for them to believe that this was really a genuine concession to those who desired denominational teaching.

Mr. LOUGH (Islington, W.) said if, as he understood, the Government were going to propose alternative words, it was very important that they should have them.

Mr. RUNCIMAN said that when they came to the Amendment which would be proposed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, they might discuss it. The only purpose he had in reading it was to show that they had in mind the point raised, and that they could not accept the Amendment.

*Mr. CAVE asked what would be the effect on subsection (6) if the Amendment was accepted in lieu of this one. If they were taking away the decision on this question from the authority and transferring it to the Board of Education, they did not want the words in subsection (6), line 33, because they simply supplied a guide to local authorities. Would it not be consequential on his right hon. friend's Amendment to leave out the words in subsection (6), to which he took some objection?

Mr. RUNCIMAN said it did not necessarily follow, and he did not think they could discuss subsection (6) on this Amendment. He would rather leave it to a later stage, when he thought he could show the hon. Member that it was in the interest of his friends. It was framed with that intention.

MR. LOUGH thought it would be more convenient if they could make an observation or two when the words were actually before them, but they had to remember the way the discussion went on, and perhaps they would never be before them. Would the right hon. Gentleman set them the example of making a suggestion as to what he would agree to with regard to this clause, and just say one word about it now? He suggested that while he could not accept these words throwing an absolute obligation on the local authority to make provision, he would go so far as to see that if they did not make accommodation available it should be left to the Board of Education to decide whether the local education authority had come to its conclusion fairly or not. In short, the matter would be left to the Board of Education. The right hon. Gentleman might well consider whether that was not throwing a very invidious duty on the Board of Education. These local authorities had not been treated very well up to the present. No option whatever was left to them, and as the clause was drawn it read: "They shall if it is reasonably practicable." These words seemed to go quite far enough. But they were going now to subject them to a trial, and if they said it was not reasonably practicable, they were going to haul them up to London before the Board of Education. That was treating these authorities rather hardly. The Committee ought to consider how the Board of Education would be able to decide this question. It would have to send down an inspector at great expense to hear evidence on both sides, and then to perform one of those duties which tempted the Board of Education into political by-paths. One Board would decide one way, and the next another. Their decisions would be very much an open question. He was glad the Amendment was not to be accepted.

MR. CAVE: After what has happened I ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD R. CECIL said the Amendment which he rose to move was one of considerable importance. Its object was to provide that except where conditions were expressly varied by the Act the conditions of denominational instruction should be the same as the conditions of undenominational instruction. It was of some importance in the practical working of this matter. For instance, children whose parents desired that they should receive denominational instruction might say: "Oh, no; we are not going in, we are going to play in the playground or the street." There was nothing in the Bill, as it stood, giving the master any disciplinary authority over the scholars in this connection. There was nothing that made the instruction any part of the ordinary curriculum of the school. All the clause said was that the local education authority were bound to provide accommodation. That was the whole obligation, and the only power given to the parents to obtain the instruction. He was not asking anything unreasonable when he asked that all the conditions that applied to the ordinary curriculum of the school, the discipline to be exercised by the master, the furniture of the school—all that kind of question should be the same as if the denominational instruction were undenominational. They were very anxious, where the authorities were hostile, that the matter should not be put on one side as a matter of no importance and an extra which the law compelled them to carry out, and which they might carry out in as perfunctory a way as possible. They were anxious that it should be a real thing, and he understood the Government wished that too. This would be a real advance towards making the right of entry effective.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 26, after the word 'instruction,' to insert the words 'upon the same conditions, save as in this Act mentioned, as any other religious instruction given in the school.'"
—(Lord R. Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. ROBSON, who was indistinctly heard, thought the words of the Amendment were a little too general. The noble Lord said the discipline of the school ought to be applied to the children while they were receiving the special religious instruction. Obviously it should, and he thought that was already provided for in the clause. The special religious instruction would undoubtedly be given between the hours to which the bye-laws applied, and even though in extreme cases it was not given between such hours, it would still be part of the instruction of the school. However, it might well be said more expressly that the children should be made subject to the discipline of the school during the special religious instruction. There would be a little danger in going much further. Supposing the whole special religious instruction was placed under the school discipline, it might have the effect of placing the clergyman who gave the religious instruction under the schoolmaster. Whatever provision was made, it must be in a better form of language. If they specified that religious instruction should be on the time-table they met all reasonable requirements.

LORD R. CECIL considered that the Attorney-General had met his point very fairly, but he asked him not to close his mind to the possibility of adopting such words as he had suggested. The difficulties of drafting, he was aware, had been very extreme, but he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would consider the possibility of adopting more general words, because it would be intensely valuable in the case of any difficulty arising to be able to say to any local authority: "You are not treating these children in the same way as other children," and they would be able to say to the local authority that it was not doing its duty.

SIR W. ROBSON replied that the Government had considered the point and had decided upon a form of words which would shortly appear on the Paper, making the intention clear.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. JAMES HOPE moved to insert after the word "instruction" the words "in a class of reasonable size." He did not think all the children requiring special instruction should be lumped together and given their instruction in a perfunctory way. He wished to secure that the instruction should be given under the best educational conditions, and among those conditions he thought a reasonably small class was one of the most important.

Amendment proposed—

“ In page 2, line 26, after the word ‘ instruction,’ to insert the words ‘ in a class of reasonable size.’ ”—(Mr. James Hope.)

Question proposed, “ That those words be there inserted.”

MR. RUNCIMAN assured the hon. Member that the proposal he had made was fully met in subsection (6) and it was quite unnecessary to insert those words at this point.

LORD R. CECIL did not quite agree that this point was met in subsection (6) which was rather a different matter. His hon. friend wished to provide that the local education authority should provide accommodation for special instruction “ in a class of reasonable size.” Subsection (6) provided that they were not to provide any accommodation at all unless certain conditions were fulfilled. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to meet the point raised by his hon. friend.

MR. JAMES HOPE could not agree that his point had been met, but he would content himself with having called attention to the matter, which might perhaps be raised later on.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. MILD MAY (Devonshire, Totnes) moved to omit the words “ on two mornings in the week on which the school meets.” He understood from what had been said earlier in the debate that the right of entry would not be restricted to two mornings in the week, but that an individual child would not have an opportunity to receive denominational instruction on more than two mornings in the week. That was a very grudging allowance, and once it was conceded that those who attended the school to give denominational teaching could be present in the schools on more than two mornings weekly, what could be said, even from the strictly undenominational point of view, against granting permission to the children to receive, on more than two mornings in the week, that religious instruction which their parents wished them to receive? There was much to be said on behalf of the parents who conscientiously urged that plea. He had never strongly upheld the denominational point of view, and he supported the Second Reading because he desired to see some settlement of their religious difficulties brought about. He voted for the Second Reading because it always seemed to him that the more they discussed these matters the greater chance there would be of understanding each other and appreciating the depth of each others religious convictions. He had an opinion that religious teaching under the Cowper-Temple clause was valuable as far as it went. But as the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone had said upon a former stage of this Bill, no one could call such religious teaching as he had in mind non-doctrinal. Although he was of opinion that religious instruction of value to the children could be imparted and in some schools was imparted under the Cowper-Temple clause, at the same time he did not ignore the fact which they had all to acknowledge and recognise that there a large body of people who took an opposite view, and who believed that such teaching, if not harmful, was absolutely worthless. They had a perfect right to hold that view, and he was certain it was honestly held, and no man had any right to dictate his views to another in this connection. Those were matters between a man and his own conscience, or perhaps he should say between a man and his Maker. When they heard some hon. Members opposite say that the teaching under the Cowper-Temple clause ought to satisfy all Protestants, he had no hesitation in declaring that the House of Commons had no right to dictate what should be the views of any in regard to the religious teaching to be given to their children. If they were to have a lasting settlement they must bear in mind a fact of very great importance in connection with the right of entry. What had Nonconformists complained of with regard to their position under the Bill of 1902? What had impelled them to passive resistance? It was that they had been compelled to pay for a religious education of which they did not approve. How did they propose under this Bill to remedy that state of things? They proposed to do it by shifting this very same grievance, which by their own admission had been intolerable to them in the past, on to the backs of others. They proposed to compel others to pay for a religious education of which those others disapproved. That was a fact which he asked hon. Gentlemen opposite not to forget. When they said this was not a balanced settlement, and that very small surrenders were required from the Church, he asked them to recall the violent terms in which they characterised some time since the bondage which they now, under this Bill, were seeking to impose upon others. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Question."] How could anyone with any sense of justice be prepared to consider the possibility of carrying into law so obviously unjust a provision as this? It was only because they hoped that the quid pro quo, which was the right of entry into all schools, would be no shadowy concession, but would be really valuable and substantial in its nature. Right of entry was of no use to Roman Catholics, and it was no use in the Roman Catholic schools in the single school areas, of which he had an example in his own constituency. The parents of those Roman Catholic schools in single districts would in future be——

MEDICAL INSPECTION OF SCHOOL CHILDREN.

VISCOUNT GALWAY rose to call attention to the fact that no grant had yet been received by county councils towards the expenses incurred for the medical inspection of children. The noble Viscount said: My Lords, it may be thought that in alluding to the education question at the present moment I am raising a somewhat delicate matter, but I can assure the House and His Majesty's Government that it is not my intention to interfere in the slightest degree with a satisfactory settlement of this much-discussed question if such a settlement can be arrived at. The point I wish to bring before your Lordships' notice is of a different character, and has reference to the cost thrown upon county councils for the medical inspection of children. The Act of 1907 enacted that it was the duty of county councils to provide for the medical inspection of children immediately before, or at the time of, or as soon as possible after, admission to the public elementary school. Regulation No. 576 followed in November of that year, and in Paragraph 4 the respective duties of the Board of Education and the local education authority were clearly set out. That paragraph stated—

“The duties thrown upon the Board consist in advising the local education authorities as to the manner in which they should carry out the provisions of the Act, and in supervising the work they are called upon to do.”

The next paragraph stated that—

“The duty of carrying out the actual inspection has necessarily been entrusted by Parliament to local education authorities and not to the Board.”

Therefore it will be seen that the whole question of managing the medical inspection devolves upon the local education authorities. Further on, the Regulation stated that three inspections were advisable—one when the child entered the school, another about the middle of its school life, and again before it left school.

I should like to say that I have no wish to disparage the great value which the medical inspection of children may be to the nation, or to thwart its being properly carried out. My point is that these demands on the local education authorities seem to go on increasing. The form as to diseases, which has to be filled up in duplicate in regard to every scholar, throws enormous labour on the medical officers appointed to carry out this work and on the chief medical officer, and consequently adds to the cost to the ratepayers. The medical officer has to report on a variety of things, and it is also laid down that he shall report to the Board of Education if the Schedules of the Board are not carried out faithfully. I may be wrong in my interpretation of the clause, but it reads as if the medical officer of the county council is to report to the Board of Education if their Schedules are not carried out. Surely the proper course would be for the Board of Education to make these inquiries through the proper channel—the clerk to the county council.

When the Act of 1907 was under discussion we were given to understand that county councils would get a substantial grant towards the extra charge which would be thrown on the rates, and a great many local education authorities hesitated to appoint officers under the Act until they knew what financial assistance they were likely to get from His Majesty's Government. As I have said, I do not wish to disparage the great value of this medical inspection, but it is of national, and not merely of local, importance, and it is, therefore, not unreasonable to hope that there will be a substantial contribution from the national Exchequer. I would ask His Majesty's Government to remember that every additional burden thrown on the ratepayers of the country is an additional burden also on the industries of the country, and thereby tends to the unemployment which we all so much regret at the present time.

There is one other point to which I should like to call attention. Section 10 of Regulation No. 576 says—

“The directions given in this circular as to the degree and frequency of inspection refer only to minimum medical inspection, the effectiveness of which will in future be one of the elements to be considered in determining the efficiency of each school as a grant-aided school.”

I venture to think that if, when these medical inspection clauses were before Parliament, it had been clearly stated that medical inspection of children was going to be made one of the points on which the efficiency grant would depend, the medical inspection clauses would not have passed as they did. In the case we have another illustration of the Board making regulations beyond what Parliament ever contemplated or intended. It is not the first time we have had to complain of this, and I hope the tendency will diminish in the future. The question of medical inspection should be kept entirely separate from the education demands of the Board of Education, and it should not be allowed in any way to affect the efficiency grant. I hope His Majesty's Government will be able to give the House a distinct assurance on both of the points I have raised.

LORD BELPER: My Lords, before the noble Earl replies, I should like to say a few words, not only to support what my noble friend has said, but also to point out what the exact position is with regard to the financial promises made on the subject of medical inspection. This matter, which is of the utmost importance to county councils, has been taken up by the County Councils Association, and there has been more than one deputation to the Minister in charge of the Board of Education. A very strong deputation from the County Councils Association waited upon Mr. McKenna in February last, and put before him the claims of county councils that medical inspection should be recognised as a national matter and that a grant should be made towards it. They pointed out how unfortunate it would be if, through the constant increase of the rates, the ratepayers got to dislike education, and as far as they could, refused to allow their representatives to spend extra money, especially on higher education. Mr. McKenna informed the deputation that he entirely sympathised with the view put before him. He said that medical inspection should be looked upon as part of the general charge for education, but he agreed that there was considerable ground for the view that the local education authorities should receive some grant from the Exchequer. He went on to say that he did not propose that that grant should be earmarked, but that a new grant should be given that would do far more than meet the cost of the additional requirements of the Bill. He added that it would be possible for the deputation to meet their ratepayers with a substantial reduction in the rates. That was a promise of a substantial grant, not only to cover present charges for education, but to allow also a reasonable sum in addition for medical inspection.

That sounded very satisfactory, but, when they looked into the figures the County Councils Association came to the conclusion, not only that there would be no grant for medical inspection at all, but that the grants that were going to be given would not be sufficient to cover the services of the Bill, and that, so far from being better off, the majority of the county councils would be worse off than at present. A deputation from the Association waited upon Mr. Runciman, who was then Minister for Education, and laid the figures before him. Mr. Runciman made certain criticisms regarding the figures. No doubt the figures were open to criticism, because they had been prepared by different counties, and were not, of course, on precisely the same lines. When those criticisms were made we at once offered to have new figures drawn up on the one basis, and to submit them to the Board of Education, whose officials could go thoroughly into them with the officials of the County Councils Association to see whether they might be taken as fairly representing the charges that would be thrown by the Bill on the county councils. Those figures were got out and submitted to the Board of Education, who were more than once asked to allow their officials to go into them. I regret to say that they did not see their way to examine the figures or to discuss them in any way; but the effect of those figures, which I contend are now unchallenged, is that upon every county council appearing in the list I have in my hand a considerable extra charge will be thrown. That varies in a very marked degree. The extra charge placed upon my own county if these figures are correct, and they have not been disputed, would be something over £12,000 a year, or an extra rate beyond that now being paid of something like 3d. in the £, that is a 40 per cent. increase on the rates raised for education. It is natural, therefore, that we should feel very great anxiety as to whether we are to receive assistance towards the expenses incurred for medical inspection.

I do not wish to discuss matters which are before the other House and which will be contained in the Bill now under discussion there; but as Mr. McKenna said that the grant for medical inspection must be included in the general grant given by the Government, it is absolutely necessary to see whether that grant is sufficient, not only for the purposes for which it is intended, but also to meet the charge for medical inspection. That is the position in which we now stand, and I think we have a right to press for an assurance in some form or another that a reasonable grant will be given towards the cost of medical inspection, which admittedly should be largely a national charge. My noble friend has referred to the fact that we are threatened with the loss of the education grants if we do not carry out medical inspection efficiently. We have every wish to carry out this work, but while the Government holds its hand it is difficult to persuade the ratepayers to put their hands into their pockets and find money for the purpose.

There is another Circular—No. 596—to which my noble friend did not allude. It covers nine pages, and contains not only regulations with regard to medical inspection, but an immense clause—no other word can be used—setting out what the annual report upon medical inspection is to contain. It goes in the greatest detail into every possible consideration that a medical officer ought to have in view. I need only quote one short subsection. An account is asked for of the methods of inspection adopted, including—

“General review of the relation of home circumstances and social and industrial conditions to the health and physical condition of the children inspected, so far as facts bearing on this point have come under notice.”

If you take that literally, it is a report on the home life and the health of every child in every school in the county. I do not desire in the least to criticise the Report asked for. I understand from those who have the technical knowledge that it is an admirable Memorandum for the purpose with a view to what may perhaps eventually be carried out, but that it is quite impossible at the present time that the Report can go into the vast number of matters mentioned. I am informed that it is not expected that county councils should make the reports in this detail in the earlier days. Indeed, the Board of Education seem to have been satisfied of the impossibility themselves, because they say—

“As regards the scope of the Report, however, the Board consider that it is desirable that it should deal with the whole subject of school hygiene, and should cover as much as possible of the ground indicated under the following heads. It is recognised that these heads suggest a degree of comprehensiveness which in many, and indeed in most, cases will not be immediately attainable.”

That qualification points out that in a great number of these matters we are not to act at once. I hope an assurance will be given that no undue severity will be used against county councils in their endeavour to carry out the requirement as to these Reports. I am sure that the work will be better done if efficiency is reached by slow degrees rather than by attempting all that may be obtainable in the future at the first moment. If there is any dissatisfaction with the heavy cost of education, the higher and scientific education, which is of the utmost importance to the country, will be certain to suffer. I have ventured to make these remarks not in any spirit of hostility. This is not a political matter in any sense, and I cordially agree with my noble friend Viscount Galway in hoping that we shall see the Bill now being discussed in the other House brought to a satisfactory issue. But, in the meanwhile, the question of finance is a most urging and pressing one, and I therefore think that this is not an inopportune moment to bring this matter to the notice of His Majesty's Government.

*THE LORD PRIVY SEAL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The EARL OF CREWE: My Lords, I have been asked to reply to the question of the noble Viscount opposite and I make no complaint whatever either of his speech or of that of the noble Lord who has just sat down. At the same time, as I shall be able to show, and as I think the noble Lord himself is aware, there are circumstances connected with the discussion in another place which make it difficult to deal quite fully with the matter this afternoon.

As the noble Viscount said, the duty of medical inspection is thrown upon the local education authority by Section 13 of the Administrative Provisions Act, which we passed with great unanimity of feeling last year. The noble Viscount seemed to me rather to belong to the school which regarded this not so much as a matter of education as of public health, and I believe there have been all through people who thought that this burden never ought to have been placed on the education rate at all, and that the duty ought, in some form or another, to have been placed on the public health authority. However that may be, and I confess I do not agree with that view, in any case it would have caused great administrative inconvenience in the counties, because there, as we all know, the health authority is not the same as the education authority, and you would have started dual control of a very inconvenient kind. I might point out in addition that even before the Act of 1902 a good deal of very effective medical inspection had been carried out by school boards, and it was generally considered that it was rather a matter for the education authority than for the public health authority; that being so, it is clear that in the first instance, whatever may be done afterwards, the cost must fall on the education rate.

During the current year, as I understand, there has been a considerable outcry on the part of local authorities at the prospect of this expenditure falling upon the rates, and the whole matter has to be considered in connection with what has been said as to increased grants on behalf of the Board of Education by the former President. Your Lordships will remember that early in this year—I think it was in March—Mr. McKenna issued a White Paper explaining the financial proposals of the Education Bill of 1908. The general effect was that these seven, I think they are, different kinds of grants now given to schools should be amalgamated, and only a single grant given. Mr. McKenna made it quite clear, when he was approached by deputations on the question of this medical inspection, that if help was to be given from central funds for that purpose it must be given in the general grant, and that it was not the intention of the Government to start a special grant for that purpose. Indeed, I think it stands to reason that the moment at which you are doing away with the multiplied grants would be an unfortunate moment at which to start a new and separate grant distinct from the general grant.

Then, as your Lordships are aware, the Education Bill came to a pause, and in those circumstances the outcry of the local authorities naturally increased. The financial proposals were part of Mr. McKenna's Bill, and it seemed as though, if that Bill did not go through, the financial proposals would not go through either. Since then, however, as your Lordships all know, the situation has changed, and the financial proposals equally form part of the present Bill; and it is this fact which makes it difficult for me to enter into any financial details on the present occasion. I understand that the clause which embodies them will be considered, according to the allotment of business in another place, on Monday next, when the whole of this matter will be argued out. Therefore, I think noble Lords will see that it would be impossible for me to enter to-day into any detail with regard to the proposed grant. When Mr. Runciman's statement has been made it will be clearly open to the noble Viscount or the noble Lord to reopen the matter at any time on the question of the inadequacy of the grant to meet this particular charge. It is generally admitted—I think the Board of Education fully admit it—that this medical inspection, if properly carried out, must involve a new burden on the local authorities; but many of the figures quoted on the subject have been undoubtedly greatly exaggerated. The noble Lord mentioned, I think, the figure of £12,000 for Nottinghamshire—or was it £18,000?

LORD BELPER: The figure was £12,000. But that is not for medical inspection. Medical inspection was mixed up by Mr. McKenna with the whole of the grants. He said that the total grant would be more than enough to meet the expenditure and leave a great deal to spare. We say that we shall get £12,000 less in Nottinghamshire.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: I am glad to hear the noble Lord's explanation. I understood him to say that the amount chargeable in respect of medical inspection in Nottinghamshire would be £12,000 a year, which seemed to me a rather fanciful estimate. Although I can quite understand the anxiety of the county councils upon it, the matter is not actually an urgent one, because the amount expended anywhere in respect of the present financial year can only be very small. Very few, I think, of the local authorities got to work much before the middle of this year, and therefore the whole matter will be settled, we assume, by the new grant, whether noble Lords think it adequate or not, in the next financial proposals. The matter consequently is not, in point of cash, so immediately urgent as might have been supposed from the speeches of the noble Lords. On the question of exaggeration, a deputation from a great county borough which waited upon the Board of Education said medical inspection there would cost 2s. 9d. per child; but when they undertook it on a larger scale than was supposed to be covered by that sum the cost was somewhere between 6d. and 1s. Therefore I think we may venture to hope that some of the fears of local authorities as to the charges which are likely to be made under this head are somewhat groundless.

LORD BELPER: The cost of medical inspection, taken in the whole of the counties, is 1s. per child. That is for next year.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: It is worked out for next year at 1s. per child?

LORD BELPER: Yes.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: Exactly. The estimate that is made for the whole country is a farthing rate. It is perfectly true that in some districts the charge may be relatively higher than in other places. I am afraid that is all I can say, because it is quite clear that we cannot, in the present position of the Bill in another place, discuss anything in the nature of actual figures. But I can assure the noble Viscount that the Board of Education are fully aware of the importance of this subject, and they do recognise the fact that a very substantial charge must be placed upon local authorities by the Act of last year. I do not entirely follow the complaint of the noble Viscount as to the effect of this being regarded as a test of the efficiency of the school. If the noble Viscount looks at the Act he will see that, under subsection (1) of Section 3, it is the duty of the local authority to provide for the medical inspection of children under the conditions which the noble Viscount read. Well, if it is a duty and that duty is neglected, the Board of Education, I should have thought, could only show its sense of the fact that the duty had been neglected in the manner of which the noble Viscount complains. We cannot regard the whole business as being distinct from education for the reasons I have stated; and, that being so, it seems to me that the Board of Education is entirely justified in taking the view which the noble Viscount thinks an unreasonable one. I have nothing to add, beyond assuring noble Lords once more that the Board of Education is fully aware of the position, and that in considering the amount of the grant this question of medical inspection will be borne in mind.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON: My Lords, nobody will doubt the sympathetic tone with which the noble Earl has just spoken, but the fact that he has to defer to a future day anything beyond an academic expression of sympathy is not at all encouraging, and my noble friend Viscount Galway can hardly be expected to let the matter drop with any feeling of complacency and satisfaction. I do not know whether it is of any use; but I have, on one or two occasions, ventured to invite the attention of the House to the extraordinary anomaly of placing additional charges on local authorities without any previous consideration having been given as to how they are to be met. I speak with some feeling on this subject, because within the last few weeks the London County Council have had to pass a very large vote for an increase of staff I think even for this year, amounting to something like £10,000, in order to begin to carry out this very heavy though probably very desirable, duty.

I ask your Lordships to consider the very different manner in which the public exchequer is protected as compared with the local exchequer. A Bill which even takes a ten-pound note out of the public exchequer has to be brought in in Committee of Supply; those provisions which involve a charge on the exchequer have to be specially underlined, and the House of Commons considers that point before it proceeds to the general consideration of the Bill. But when a measure is proposed which lays a considerable charge on local authorities it very often slips through Parliament without consideration, or, at all events, without the smallest estimate being asked for as to whether the charge is to amount to a 1d. rate, a 2d. rate, or a much higher rate. The House should bear in mind the enormous indebtedness of the local authorities, and the great pressure already existing on the rates. Some policy should be adopted of bringing these measures forward in a special manner before the notice of Parliament, and they should not be allowed to pass without being referred to a special Committee with orders to report as to the likely incidence of the charge. The medical inspection of school children, especially in view of the statistics which have been laid before us, is a matter of national moment and probably a national necessity; obviously, therefore, it should be a national and not a local charge. I did not rise to do more than throw out the suggestion I have made.

LORD CLIFFORD OF CHUDLEIGH: My Lords, I shall not detain the House for more than a minute, but I rise to reply to the statement of the noble Earl the Leader of the House that he could not understand our particular grievance in objecting to the Board of Education taking neglect on the part of the local education authority to have a proper system of medical inspection as a test of the efficiency of the school. The noble Earl said the duty is cast on the local education authority to do this, and therefore it is quite proper that the grant given to them should be stopped if they fail in their duty. But our grievance is this, that this duty was cast upon us because it was the most convenient way of having medical inspection carried out. It was admitted on all hands that the object of the inspection was not purely educational, but partly national; therefore, it was something quite distinct from anything which the local education authorities ever thought to be part of their duty in providing educational instruction in the schools. The grants which have up to this point been given have been awarded invariably for educational work done in the schools or for the educational efficiency of the buildings themselves, and it is very hard that neglect of this new duty cast upon local education authorities should be met by taking off a grant which was given for a totally different purpose. We entirely deny that medical inspection is a form of education; it is a duty cast upon us for the national good, and we maintain that the National Exchequer should assist us, and that the Department should not adopt the expedient of cutting off grants for which services have been already rendered.

VISCOUNT GALWAY: My Lords, although we have not obtained quite as satisfactory an answer from the noble Earl as we should have wished, we at any rate have the admission that this work of medical inspection does demand some contribution from the National Exchequer. As to stopping the grant in respect of the efficiency of the school, I should like to have had some assurance that in the present transition stage there will be no question of withdrawing the grant from county councils, at any rate for another year, while they are appointing inspectors to carry out this work.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY (LORD FITZMAURICE): My Lords, the question which the noble Viscount opposite has brought before the House, and in regard to which he has received the support of my noble friend who is chairman of the County Councils Association, is undoubtedly one worthy of the attention of Parliament; but the Government feel that owing to the course of business, especially in regard to education, they are not in a position to make a statement in every way as satisfactory as could be wished. Naturally, it was our hope that the financial proposals which were an integral part of the educational proposals of the Government might, with others, have received the sanction of Parliament, and in that case the matter, even if it had been urgent, still would not have been as urgent as undoubtedly it is at the present moment in the eyes of local education authorities. I certainly can say that, in regard to the policy of the immediate future, the Board of Education will bear in mind the financial complications of this matter. At the same time, we feel that physical training, of which medical inspection is really at the root, is a matter of great urgency and importance, in some ways as important almost as education itself. Indeed, the two things are so closely connected from a scientific point of view that it is not necessary for me to labour that point. I think this particular question has also been unfortunate in that it has arrived in the world of local finance at the same time as other questions which have not been the result of the policy of the Government or of any desire on the part of the local authorities themselves to spend more money upon what may be called ancient services, but which have been entirely due to causes beyond the control of Parliament and the local authorities. I refer to such matters as the greatly increased cost of the upkeep of roads and highways. This additional expenditure, coming simultaneously with the increase in educational charges, has exasperated the local authorities, and I could only wish that the whole situation was more under the control of the Government than it is. But, clearly, the great increase in the cost of the upkeep of our roads through motor and similar traffic is not a matter for which the Government has any responsibility. I am afraid that what I am saying is rather cold comfort; but noble Lords opposite know that, as a former chairman of a county council, I am entirely in sympathy with them, and I can assure them that in regard to the immediate future the Board of Education will do its best to recognise the difficulties of local education authorities in the matter.

INCEST BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Lord Fitzmaurice.

*THE LORD BISHOP OF ST. ALBANS: My Lords, I think I shall best commend this Bill, the subject of which is of a very painful and distressing nature, by self-restraint and reserve rather than by any force of words. The object of the Bill is to make incest what it is in Scotland, what it is in a number of our Colonies, what it is in certain of the States of America and in a large number of civilised countries, but what at the present moment it is not in England—a crime.

The Bill enacts that any male person who has carnal knowledge of a female person, who is to his knowledge his granddaughter, daughter, sister, or mother, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and upon conviction thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Judge of Assize, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not less than three years, and not exceeding seven years, or to be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years with or without hard labour. All else is detail, which can be better discussed in Committee than on Second Reading. The special reason for introducing the Bill, which has already passed the House of Commons, is the great frequency of incest. It appears, from a communication made to the Home Office by the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, that the society has records of no less than forty-two cases brought to their notice in the last twelve months, some of which are described as being of the most appalling nature. The Home Office, I am also informed, has been told that the Birmingham education authority know of eleven cases of persons living under these circumstances at present in that city, ten being cases of father and daughter and one of brother and sister. I am further told that, as regards cases of rape and carnal knowledge of girls which came before the Home Office on petitions for remission of sentence, it was found that in no fewer than fifty-one out of 193 cases the criminal intercourse was incestuous. Thirty-six cases have also come to the notice of the Metropolitan Police alone, and twelve to the notice of the Liverpool police.

I had hoped that the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chief Justice would have been able to be present to-night to support this Bill. He is, however, detained at the Assizes at Birmingham, but he has sent me this telegram—

“ You can state that I support the Bill. I have received and sent to the Home Secretary presentments of grand juries pointing out the urgent necessity for an amendment of the law, in consequence of the frequency of assaults by fathers on their daughters.”

These, my Lords, are facts which speak for themselves, and, I venture to think, justify this Bill. There are objections which might, perhaps, be taken, such as the objection to the evil of publication; but I am told that in Scotland, where incest has been a crime for more than three centuries, the newspapers treat these cases with very great discretion and that no real evil has arisen. It may be said, again, that this would offer opportunity for blackmail. I reply that this is not the experience of Scotland; and, further, if this is to be made a reason of itself against the Bill it is surely a reason also against dealing with any of the offences included in the Criminal Law Amendment Act. I venture to think that the frequency of this terrible form of crime, as I hope it will be now formally made in England, justifies this measure; and, without further language, I will move its Second Reading, in the hope that the Bill, which has passed through the other House with the good wishes of both sides, may receive similar treatment at your Lordships' hands.

Moved, “ That the Bill be now read 2.”—(The Lord Bishop of St. Albans.)

THE LORD STEWARD (Earl BEAUCHAMP): My Lords, I think all your Lordships will agree that we owe a very great debt of gratitude to the right rev. Prelate who has just spoken. As he very rightly said, this is not a pleasant topic or one which any member of your Lordships' House would wish to discuss at length. My chief object in rising is to say that while His Majesty's Government do not think this is a matter which they would be justified in bringing to your Lordships' notice or taking full responsibility for, yet the Home Secretary and the Home Office hope that your Lordships will see your way to pass the Bill into law. They are convinced of the necessity for legislation to deal with this evil, and, therefore, they hope the Bill may become law during the present session. I do not know that it is necessary to add much to what was said by the right rev. Prelate, but this, however, I might say. In a certain number of crimes of a similar character it might be argued that it would be desirable not to take steps with regard to them, because they affect nobody but those immediately concerned; but your Lordships will see that that is not the case with regard to crimes of this character, and that there are, as the result of intercourse between the various people mentioned in the Bill, offspring on whom the punishment chiefly falls. In these circumstances I venture to hope your Lordships will give the Bill a Second Reading.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, the mischief aimed at by this Bill, is one which your Lordships must all admit to be a very serious and grave one; and not in this House, or I should think anywhere in the country, are there two opinions as to the desirability of reducing that mischief. But, personally, I have some little hesitation in feeling certain that a Bill which turns this particular mischief into a crime in the eyes of the law will necessarily reduce it. I do not know the statistics, but I cannot help thinking that the amount of the mischief is really very small, and that in the great majority of families in this country such a mischief as is aimed at by this Bill never enters into the heads of anyone. Newspapers may exercise, in regard to trials of this kind, a very proper discretion, but you have people in Court, the jury and neighbours, and there is the danger of something which had never entered the heads of people being put there by proceedings of this kind. I think I remember that the noble and learned Earl the ex-Lord Chancellor used sometimes to express doubts as to the wisdom of legislation of this character. I agree that this particular Bill, if it is desired to deal with the matter by legislation, is drawn in what I venture to say respectfully is, perhaps, the best possible way that it could be drawn, and meets the mischief in the best possible manner; and in the subsidiary clauses, as to the custody of the children, I am sure your Lordships must all concur. I cannot help myself feeling some doubt as to whether the measure will in the end prove remedial. The matter is one which it is obviously difficult to discuss, but I would venture to suggest that if the Bill is read a second time it should be sent to a Select Committee, so that the evidence of those who have to deal with the administration of the law may be obtained as to the best way of dealing with this matter.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord LOREBURN): My Lords, I rise to state in two or three words my own view about this matter. I do hope that, whatever the House does, it will not send this Bill to a Select Committee. That would only mean the destruction of the Bill by a side wind. If it is wrong, it is much better to throw it out now and be done with it. The question is whether this will be an effective remedy. There is no other remedy known to the law except to punish people who commit acts which are considered to be crimes. I cannot help thinking that it is better that the community should stigmatise as a crime that which is a crime in substance, seeing that it produces not only moral depravity but also physical deterioration. I hope your Lordships will see your way to give the Bill a Second Reading.

THE EARL OF CREWE: My Lords, I wish to add one word to what has fallen from other speakers on this Bill. The course of legislation dealing with this exceedingly unpleasant subject has been a peculiar one. A Bill was introduced in the last Parliament by the noble Earl opposite, Lord Donoughmore. The noble and learned Earl, Lord Halsbury, rose, I think at once, and strongly objected to the Second Reading of the Bill—I have every reason to believe he still maintains that opinion—and a general agreement was expressed in the House that it should not be proceeded with. Therefore, the practical unanimity with which the Bill has been received on this occasion is, in itself, perhaps, rather singular. I somewhat differ, with great respect, from my right hon. friend the Home Secretary, as regards the advantage of passing a measure of this kind, mainly on the ground that I am under the impression that a very large proportion of the cases—90 per cent. or more—can already be dealt with either under the Cruelty to Children Acts or under the Criminal Law Amendment Act. I also to some extent share the opinion expressed by the noble Earl behind me. I do not, however, desire to oppose the Second Reading. Perhaps this is one of the cases where the Bill might with advantage go to the Standing Committee, where its consideration could be more freely and profitably carried on than in Committee of the Whole House. I therefore hope the Bill will be allowed to go to the Standing Committee when the time comes.

On Question, Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

THE ALIENS ACT.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE rose “to call attention to the administration of the Aliens Act; and to move for Papers.” The noble Earl said: My Lords, I have not placed this notice on the Paper with the intention of in any way raising the policy of the Aliens Act, or troubling your Lordships with any lengthy observations upon the general question of whether or not we should exclude aliens from this country. I rather wish to take the view that the Act is on the Statute-book, and that it is one of the few great Acts of their predecessors which His Majesty's Government are not busily attempting to modify by new legislation. I therefore accept the Act as a starting point. I do not desire in any way to go into its merits. At the same time I am sure noble Lords opposite will allow me to say that a new theory has been imported into the administration of this country during the last few years. I do not think the Home Office were the originators of it. I think the Irish Office can claim that distinction. But a new idea seems to be abroad that it is the duty of the Government not to administer the Act as they find them, but in a way as favorable as possible to their own personal opinions, even though it may be contrary to the intentions of Parliament. That is what has taken place undoubtedly in the case of the Aliens Act. In fact, by its administration it has been turned into a farce.

May I, very briefly, remind your Lordships of what is, after all, the salient point in the working of the Act? One of its most important clauses defined an immigrant ship—and the Act applies to no ship that is not an immigrant ship—as a ship arriving with twenty steerage passengers or such smaller number as the Secretary of State for the Home Department should determine. Inquiries made between the passing of the Act and the coming into office of the present Administration evidently convinced the Secretary of State for the time that twenty was too large a number if the Act was to be made effective, and twelve was therefore substituted. That was in December, 1905; but in March of the following year the present Home Secretary changed the number again to twenty. Thus all that the most criminal or most diseased alien has got to do is to wait in one of the large ports abroad and keep his eye steadily glued on vessels leaving for England, and when he finds a ship leaving with only eighteen steerage passengers he can join it, knowing that the Act would be unable to keep him out of this country. The result has been that the traffic has been regularly organised, and whereas the sheep, as I may describe the desirable aliens according to the Act, are fully inspected by medical and immigration officers, the goats—those aliens whom it is known are unlikely to pass such inspection—are sent over to this country in batches of nineteen or less, and in that case the medical officer makes a merely formal examination of them, and there is absolutely no power of rejection.

According to the latest Return, 61,758 aliens arrived in this country last year, a decrease of 2,555 as compared with the total for 1906. Owing to the fact that 20,564 arrived in non-immigrant vessels, the number inspected was 41,194, a decrease of 3,089 as compared with the number inspected in the previous year. Of 6,143 passengers who arrived in London only 2,354 were inspected, more than one-half of the total number having arrived in non-immigrant ships. The result must be that large numbers of aliens are coming in whom the Act was intended to exclude and who ought to be excluded in the interests of the community.

Two cases will show how the Act is working. The first was the well-known case of twenty-six German gipsies who, having been rejected at Hartlepool, left, and, dividing themselves into two parties of fourteen and twelve respectively, landed at Leith about two years ago. The Secretary of State, when questioned on the subject in the House of Commons, pointed out that the objectionable practice on the part of shipowners of dividing a party in order to secure entry was contrary to the spirit of the Act, and as regards the ships of the firm concerned, the Secretary of State cut down the number from twenty to two, and claimed that his action in that case prevented any further entry of undesirables. Those twenty-six persons, who had been stamped by the officers at Hartlepool as undesirables, roamed about the country, causing a nuisance in many places and putting the local authorities to considerable expense. In Cheshire it was found necessary to tell off 159 policemen for special duty in regard to aliens who had been allowed to land before the Home Secretary's Special Order was issued. The country has been saddled with the presence of these aliens, who could and should have been kept out if the Act had been carried out in a proper spirit, and twelve had been allowed to remain the number of steerage passengers constituting a vessel an immigrant ship. The second case is known as the Hull case, and in that instance four Russian-Jew immigrants who had been refused permission to land were promptly landed from a non-immigrant ship. The Home Secretary stated that he had little doubt that such a practice was carried on in a systematic way at Hull, and he told us that it was engaging his attention. So far as we know, it is still engaging his attention, and presumably this infamous practice still remains possible.

The only remedy is to cut down the number of steerage passengers who constitute the vessel carrying them an immigrant ship, and render the passengers subject to inspection in accordance with the Act. In regard to the Leith case, the Secretary of State claimed that by cutting down the number from twenty to two any further entry of these undesirables has been prevented; and I submit that there is no reason for the Government refusing to adopt a similar procedure in all the ports in the kingdom to which this Act applies.

Moved, "That there be laid before the House Papers relating to the administration of the Aliens Act."—(The Earl of Donoughmore.)

EARL BEAUCHAMP: My Lords, the noble Earl has directed attention to one feature in the administration of the Aliens Act, and to one alone. There is, however, another feature in connection with which, I hope, he thinks His Majesty's Government does deserve some credit. I allude to that part of the Act which has reference to the deportation of aliens whose expulsion has been recommended by various Courts of justice throughout the country. I hope the noble Earl will kindly look at the Reports which have been laid on the Table of your Lordships' House, and I am sure he will be satisfied with the action taken by the Home Office in that regard. Admittedly, prevention is better than cure; but if aliens want to enter this country, it is possible for them to find more than one way of evading the Act. Take, for instance, the case of first-class passengers. First-class passengers can enter without let or hindrance, for the provisions in the Aliens Act apply only to steerage passengers. I cannot help being struck by the fact that the noble Earl has mentioned the cases of only thirty undesirable people having come into the country during the period of two years and nine months that the Act has been in force. With regard to the case of the German gipsies, I would point out that there is no immigration officer or medical inspector at Hartlepool, because it is not an immigration port, and therefore those gipsies could not have been stamped there as undesirables. But supposing the course recommended by the noble Earl had been taken and the number of passengers reduced from twenty to twelve, it would still have been possible for those gipsies to have divided themselves into three parties instead of two and thus to have evaded the Act. It is perfectly true that the Secretary of State made an order reducing the number to two in the case of a particular line of steamers, and I think the action of my right hon. friend in that case shows that it is within the power, and that it is the desire of the Secretary of State to prevent such aliens from coming into this country. I am informed that these gipsies to whom the noble Earl referred have all since left the country. In the case of the systematic importation of destitute alien to Hull from a particular port abroad on a particular line of ships, the Home Secretary has been enabled to take such steps as have led to the cessation of that traffic. The fact is that the machinery of this Act, with its constant statistics which are always coming to the notice of the Home Office, enables the Secretary of State to keep in touch with the constantly varying features of this alien traffic, and to strike whenever any necessity is really shown. I think we may fairly claim, on behalf of the Government, that the Home Secretary has exercised his powers fairly and fully, and, I hope, to the entire satisfaction of the two Houses of Parliament.

VISCOUNT RIDLEY: My Lords, as far as I understood the speech of my noble friend who initiated this discussion the two specific cases that he raised were given as instances, and not as in any sense a representation of what is really happening. The noble Earl the Lord Steward has not, I venture to say, given any reason why the Home Office regulation should not have fixed, if not two, at any rate twelve, as the number under the clause in question. I find, from a perusal of the figures, that in certain ports of the kingdom the proportion of immigrants who come in in non-immigrant ships is larger than it was, and that in some cases there are actually more immigrants coming in in non-immigrant ships than in immigrant ships. The Home Office have only to alter the number in order to turn these non-immigrant ships into immigrant ships and thus have these people investigated. There is, too, a distinct increase in the number of aliens to whom poor law relief has been granted, and in particular there is a large proportionate increase in the number of aliens of unsound mind who pass through the hands of the Poor Law authorities. Are not those the kind of undesirable aliens for instance of whose entry the Lord Steward asked? I cannot help thinking that at this particular time, when unemployment is so serious a question that His Majesty's Government are driven to adopt special measures to deal with it, the Government have at least one remedy for that evil to their hand, for they can, by a stroke of the pen, render ships which are non-immigrant ships, whose undesirable aliens are not properly investigated, immigrant ships, whose passengers could be investigated. It might be that you would not thereby keep out a great many more, but perhaps you would. It is a mere matter of administration; and surely His Majesty's Government might try it. It does not conflict with any principle, but is, as I have said, merely a question of altering the number by a stroke of the pen; and I venture to think the noble Earl has given no reason why, in the present state of affairs, the Government should not take this very simple and obvious step. It might do some good, and obviously it could not do any harm.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, I think the noble Earl who represents the Home Office may very fairly take credit for the manner in which the Act has been used for what always seemed to me one of its most valuable objects—the expulsion of undesirable people who had settled in this country. With regard to the turning back of such persons when attempting to land on these shores, I think my two noble friends have shown that there is reason to suppose that a little more vigilance is required than has yet been exercised. It is, of course, true that many people disliked the Aliens Act and were doubtful as to the wisdom of any measure of the kind. But, now that it is on the Statute-book, it seems to me obvious that it should be administered in such a way as to make it really effectual for the purpose for which it was designed. And, at this moment, there does seem to be something almost farcical in the way in which the Act is put into operation. You have a state of things under which the same individual can be turned back if he happens to form one of a party of twenty-one persons, but cannot be turned back if he happens to form one of a party of nineteen. And then, again, as I understand it, the same ship becomes an immigrant ship if she happens to have twenty steerage passengers, whereas she ceases to be an immigrant ship if, on the next voyage, she has only fourteen or fifteen. I do not say it is very easy to deal with these points, but I do think that just now, in particular, the matter should be watched, because, obviously, it is not beyond the power of these people, and of those who endeavour to land them in this country, so to organise the traffic that they will altogether elude the meshes of the Aliens Act. I do not know that we can take the matter further this evening. I would only express my hope that the evidence that has been produced will be carefully considered by the Home Office, and that whatever can be done to meet this difficulty will be done.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE, who had the following Question on the Paper—namely: “To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies what Government measures are likely to be submitted to this House during the remaining days of the session; and whether he is able to state approximately the amount of time which His Majesty's Government propose to allot to each of those measures”—said: My Lords, I do not think the noble Earl to whom I am going to address this Question will complain of me on the ground that it is in any way irrelevant or even premature. Indeed, many of my noble friends on this side of the House have, I know, for sometime past, been extremely anxious that information should be elicited from His Majesty's Government as to the probable course of events during the remainder of the session, but I certainly felt that, so long as the Licensing Bill was still in suspense, it was not fair to invite His Majesty's Government to make any statement of the kind to the House. Now, however, we are able to count the measures which still remain undisposed of, and, also, to count the days which will be available for dealing with them on the assumption which, I notice, is freely made out-of-doors, that the appropriate date for prorogation will fall before the arrival of Christmas.

I see that, of the Bills mentioned in the King's Speech, the following have still to come before your Lordships' House. In the first place, there is the Education Bill, which, of course, is not the Bill which came before Parliament earlier in the session, but an entirely new measure of which we are all aware. Then there is the Bill dealing with the hours of labour in coal mines. There is a Bill dealing with the Housing of the Working Classes and Town Planning. That, I may mention, is a Bill covering thirty-three pages besides six schedules—a Bill in which many of your Lordships take a great interest. There is the Port of London Bill—another very lengthy Bill, covering fifty-three pages and dealing with an expenditure of no less than twenty-three millions of money. Besides these, there is a Bill dealing with the Irish land question, and there are the two Scottish Bills which were revived this year—the Bills which your Lordships dealt with during the last session of Parliament. And to these there have been added several other Bills, one dealing with Scottish Education, one with the Prevention of Crime, and a Bill dealing with the use of White Phosphorous, in which, I am told, much interest is taken. The only Government measure which is now down on your Lordships' Paper is the Scottish Education Bill, which, I understand, will come on on Monday next. According to my calculations, and on the assumption which I made just now, there will be thirteen working days left for this House between Monday next and Christmas Eve, and what I wish to elicit from His Majesty's Government is some information as to the manner in which those few days are to be turned to account.

I will venture to make one or two observations. In the first place with regard to the Education Bill. This is a Bill which, I will take it upon myself to say, is regarded in this House with the most intense interest. The subject is one with which your Lordships have had a great deal to do, and this particular Bill, I might almost say, had its origin in this House, because I doubt extremely whether we should ever have heard of it had it not been for the initiative of the most rev. Primate, whose efforts to bring about an amicable settlement of this difficult question have elicited the sincere admiration even of those who do not entirely agree with him. I am told that the earliest date on which the Education Bill can come up to your Lordships' House is Monday, the 14th of this month. The usual sources of information acquaint us that upon that evening the Secretary of State for India intends to make a statement of the very utmost importance to your Lordships, but, assuming that the Secretary of State's statement does not prevent our commencing operations with the Education Bill, I do not think it is too much to assume—indeed, I do not know whether I have any right to make such an assumption—that the Education Bill, if it is to be at all discussed, would take the whole of that week. It comes to us recommended as an amicable settlement of the education question, and for that reason we shall all of us, no doubt, approach it with a favourable predisposition. But we shall most certainly expect to have time to consider it fully and to discuss it, not only in the debate on Second Reading, but on the Committee stage. Therefore, I think I am not making an extravagant assumption, when I assume that at least the whole of the week beginning 14th December will be required for the Education Bill.

How, then, shall we stand at the beginning of the following week—Monday, the 21st? We shall be within four days of Christmas Eve, and we shall still have to deal with the whole of the other Bills I have mentioned—the Coal Mines Bill, the Housing of the Working Classes Bill, the Port of London Bill; I do not refer to the Irish Land Bill because, I take it, it is not seriously intended that it should be persevered with at present. It is, I think, pretty obvious that it will be a physical impossibility for your Lordships' House, even if we proceed with the extraordinary expedition which sometimes characterises our debates at the end of the session, to undertake the consideration of all these important measures, and I want to ask the noble Earl whether he can tell us how His Majesty's Government suggest we should proceed. They must obviously have had this matter under their consideration. They must have plans of some kind of their own. We have had in the past many protests and many promises in regard to this subject, but I do not think I am exaggerating when I say that at this moment the prospect is more hopeless than it has ever been towards the end of a session. We were asked to meet again in the autumn with the idea of giving more time to the discussion of public business. The only result, so far as I can see, is that still further measures have been added to those which were already before Parliament, and that the congestion of business, instead of being less, is greater than it was before.

I can assure the noble Earl opposite that I raise this question without any desire to make party capital out of it. The difficulty is one which confronts noble Lords opposite at this moment, but it is a difficulty which has confronted, and must confront again whatever Government is in power. It arises from several causes. One of these, if I may say so without disrespect, is the voracious appetite for legislation which prevails at the time in which we live—an appetite which the Government of the day must endeavour to some extent to satisfy. Another cause is the extreme length and complexity of the Bills which are presented to Parliament. That, again, is perhaps, inevitable, because it seems to me to stand to reason that the more Bills you place upon the Statute-book the more complex and intricate become the Bills which succeed them, and which, in most cases, amend or modify them. And in the third place there is another obvious cause, which is the desire of Members of Parliament in both Houses, to take more part than they used to do in the discussion of public business. I say, therefore, that both parties are interested in discovering some means of relieving this congestion, this intolerable pressure, which arises year after year, and, although this is not the occasion for making suggestions—it would not be our business to make them—I will take upon myself to say that I do not believe that it should be beyond the power of Parliament to discover some means of solving this difficulty. I observed the other day that a distinguished colleague of the noble Earl, the Irish Secretary, made an intimation to the effect that if any Bills were to be carried over this session he expected his Bill, the Irish Land Bill, to be carried over. I do not know whether that revealed a glimpse of the intentions of His Majesty's Government—I do not pursue that suggestion further—but I am deeply convinced that, if both Houses and both political parties set their minds to it, it should be possible to discover some reasonable means of relieving Parliament of the necessity of doing twice over, in two successive sessions, work which has been done in the previous session, and of, at any rate, relieving this House from what I think I have before described as the scandalous situation in which we too often find ourselves placed in the expiring days of the session.

THE EARL OF CREWE: My Lords, I am afraid I am not able to give a very full reply to the Question asked by the noble Marquess for reasons which I will explain in a moment. I desire to say at once that, in my judgment, nothing could have been fairer than the tone or temper in which the noble Marquess has approached the subject, which is itself one, as we all know, of extreme difficulty. In regard to the work at the moment it is the case, as the noble Marquess has said, that the Scottish Bill is the only Government Bill of any importance which is likely to be before the House in the immediate future. The Second Reading has been put down for Monday next. Therefore, this week and next are not fully occupied. The noble Marquess has supplied a reason for that in alluding to what I cannot help thinking he somewhat facetiously called the state of suspense in which the Licensing Bill was supposed to be. These are the days in which you would naturally have been giving consideration to that Bill in Committee had it passed a Second Reading. Unfortunately, as I have said, I am not able to give a full account because I cannot anticipate the statement which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister will make in another place, and which, I understand, he may not be able to make this week. But I can say that, in addition to the Scottish Bill, I should hope that the Port of London Bill will reach its last stage in another place some time in the middle of next week, and it will then, of course, be available for our discussion. If the Education Bill finds a successful passage through another place it would be read there a third time on Saturday, the 12th, and a sitting would be held here to read it a first time upon that afternoon. That would enable the Second Reading to be taken on Tuesday, the 15th. I do not quarrel with the noble Marquess for saying that at any rate the greater part of that week, even if we were to sit, as I think the House might be disposed to do, both on Friday and on Saturday, if necessary, would have to be given to the discussion of the Education Bill. At the same time I think it is reasonable to point out that the subject is so exceedingly familiar to the House from the various occasions on which it has been discussed here, that discussion upon it ought to pass more rapidly than would naturally be the case with a Bill of that length and importance. At any rate the whole terminology is known to everybody—even to the point, I should imagine, of disgust—and discussion may therefore be fairly supposed to be more concentrated than would otherwise be the case. I am not in a position to-day to mention any more measures. It is perfectly true, as the noble Marquess points out, that all the measures mentioned in the King's Speech cannot possibly become law during the present session. It is, of course, our hope and desire that the prorogation should take place before Christmas, and supposing we sat on Friday and Saturday, it would leave nine working days from Monday, the 14th. I can at this moment only leave it to noble Lords to imagine how much more work besides the Education Bill can be included in those nine days.

LORD NEWTON: My Lords, these discussions upon the time which is available for business have long ago

lost the attraction of novelty for me, as I presume they have for everybody else. I have sat in this House now for ten years, and I have a distinct recollection of hearing similar speeches made from both sides once if not twice in the course of the year. The only difference between the discussion on this occasion and similar discussions in previous years is that what I would venture to call the Parliamentary harlequinade is to take place at a more appropriate season than usual. There is only one really effective means of dealing with a situation of this kind. I do, as a matter of fact, remember one occasion on which it was effectively dealt with, when noble Lords on the other side of the House succeeded, much to their credit, in talking out the Finance Bill. But there is a heroic method by which the difficulty can be confronted if necessary. I would remind the House of a Resolution unanimously passed by your Lordships' House on 6th April, 1905. It ran—

“That this House, recognising its duties as a deliberative Assembly, protests against the practice of introducing Bills into it under conditions which afford insufficient time for their consideration, and declares its intention to refuse to consider any Bill unless sufficient opportunity be afforded for due deliberation thereon.”

This appears to me to be an admirable occasion on which to put this Resolution into force. There is one important measure in the Government programme in which I take a personal interest. It is the Mines (Eight Hours) Bill. The noble Earl has preserved a judicious silence about the fate of that measure, and I would be much obliged if, before we separate, some light could be thrown on what is likely to happen to it. I do not wish to add my voice to the general grumble on this occasion, but I would venture to point out that there is no use in passing blood-and-thunder Resolutions of this kind unless you are prepared to act up to them. At the present moment I am afraid that if we were to act up to this Resolution our attitude would be liable to misrepresentation. We should be accused of being actuated not so much by want of time as by want of sympathy with the measures brought up. But if we on this side do ever sit upon the opposite side of the House again, I hope we shall act in a different way, and that if our own party send up Bills of great importance in the last days of the session, allowing practically not much more than a few minutes apiece for consideration, we shall decline to consider them. I submit that it is not much use making these protests unless we are in earnest, and the best way of showing that we are in earnest is to pursue when we are in office the policy I have indicated.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: My Lords, one Bill has entirely escaped notice. I refer to the measure to consolidate the Agricultural Holdings Acts of Scotland, which has been down for some time on the Paper in the name of the noble Earl the President of the Board of Agriculture. I think the fate of that Bill can be decided pretty easily one way or the other. I understand it has not been through the other House of Parliament, and it is not entirely a Consolidating Bill, there being new matter in it. In these circumstances, I suggest that either the Bill should have been brought on for consideration in this House before now, or we should be told that it is not to be carried through this session.

THE EARL OF CREWE: I will bring the matter to the notice of my noble friend, who, I am sorry to say, is not in his place to-day.

LORD NEWTON: What is the position of the Mines (Eight Hours) Bill?

THE EARL OF CREWE: I am afraid I am not in a position to inform the noble Lord. I should be very glad to, if I could.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS
CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Import Duties on British Salt abroad.

MR. C. B. HARMSWORTH (Worcestershire, Droitwich): To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are import duties on British salt in the several European countries, in the United States of America, in India, and in the self-governing Colonies of the Crown, respectively, classifying the salt as brown, light brown, pink and dark red rock, and as manufactured table salt.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The information desired by my hon. friend will be found fully set out on pages 589-590 of the Foreign Import Duties Return [Cd. 3859], and on pages 383-385 of the Colonial Import Duties Return [Cd. 3708]. The only amendments to be made to this information since the publication of these Returns refer to Bulgaria, where the duty on rock and kitchen salt is now 6 frs. per 100 kilogs. (2s. 5½d. per cwt.) with an additional octroi duty of 20 per cent. of the Customs duty, and Australia where light brown and pink rock salt have been added to the free list.

Isle of Ely Small Holdings Committee and Co-operative Associations.

MR. BECK (Cambridgeshire, Wisbech): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he is aware that the small holdings committee of the Isle of Ely County Council, in their report to the council upon the work already done in acquiring land for small holdings, recommend that for the present land be let to individuals and not to co-operative associations; and whether, in view of the provisions of the Small Holdings Act and of the many benefits resulting to all concerned from a system of co-operation, the Board of Agriculture will immediately point out to the Isle of Ely County Council the necessity for not adopting upon this particular point, the policy advocated by their committee.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) The Board are already in communication with the county council, and one of the Commissioners will take an early opportunity of discussing the matter personally with them.

Foot-and-Mouth Disease in the United States.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether in view of the proclamation of two more States in the United States as infected with foot-and-mouth disease, he can state the policy of the Board with regard to this condition of affairs; and whether the Board does not consider that the time has come to prohibit all importations of live stock from the United States, even for slaughter at the port of entry.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) The Board are carrying out their statutory obligations in regard to the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in America. They are satisfied that the very stringent measures adopted by the Federal Government of the United States of America for stamping out and preventing the spread of the disease are sufficient to render the action suggested by the hon. Member unnecessary at the present time.

New Lighthouse Sites.

MR. DUNDAS WHITE (Dumbartonshire): To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will say what sites have been acquired within the last ten years by the Trinity House and the Commissioners of Irish Lights, respectively, for purposes connected with the erection of new lighthouses, but not including those acquired for buoys, beacons, or other purposes, stating as regards each site the date of purchase, the approximate area, and the purchase price.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The following statements which I have received from the Trinity House and the Commissioners of Irish Lights will give my hon. friend the information he desires:—

Statement No. 1 :—Particulars of Sites acquired by the Trinity House during the last ten years for purposes connected with new Lighthouses.

Flooding of Irish Rivers.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that serious and increasing injury is being done to tenant purchasers whose holdings lie alongside the small rivers and water-courses of Ireland by reason of the fact that the rivers are choked with weeds and invading the neighbouring lands; and whether the Government will bring the matter under the notice of the Estates Commissioners in order to see if anything can be done to provide against such flooding in the future.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) In districts not under the control of a drainage board the cleansing of small watercourses would seem to be a matter for voluntary co-operation on the part of tenant purchasers. I am not aware that the Estates Commissioners have any powers in the matter, but I will consult them on the subject.

Women Clerks in the Foreign Office.

MR. COOPER (Southwark, Bermondsey): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there are any women clerks in the First or Second Division in his Department, and, if any, will he state the number in each division.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) There are no women clerks of the First or Second Division in the Foreign Office.

Persons Prosecuted for Corrupt Municipal Administrations.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): To ask Mr. Attorney-General if he can state the number of persons during the past two years that have been successfully proceeded against in the London area for corrupt municipal administration, and the professions of such persons.

(Answered by Sir William Robson.) Twenty-two persons have been successfully prosecuted in the London district for corrupt municipal administration during the past two years, and at the present moment further cases of the same character affecting ten persons are pending. Of the twenty-two persons convicted, five were workhouse officials, three were contractors, and the remainder were mostly small tradesmen or persons in somewhat poor circumstances. One convicted person had been three times mayor of a Metropolitan borough, and another had been an alderman of the London County Council.

British Subjects and the Berne Copyright Union.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the hardship and loss which, by the adhesion of any country for the first time to the Berne Copyright Union, will be inflicted upon British subjects who, before such adhesion, may have purchased but not yet published manuscript arrangements of musical and other works originating in that country; whether the free publication in the United Kingdom of works so purchased has been provided for by the Berne Conference or otherwise, and, if not, whether he can take any steps to secure that British subjects shall not be deprived of rights which they have lawfully purchased by the action of any foreign Power.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) Section 6 of the International Copyright Act, 1886, provides that where any person has before the date of the publication of an Order in Council lawfully produced any work in the United Kingdom, the issue of the Order shall not diminish or prejudice any rights or interests arising from or in connection with such production which are subsisting and valuable at the said date. A period of some months usually elapses between the definite adhesion of a new country to the Berne Convention and the publication of the consequent Order in Council in this country, and this interval would probably be sufficient to allow of the production of any work which may be existing in manuscript at the time, and any rights which may have been acquired by purchase or otherwise can thus be preserved.

Irish Agricultural Exports.

MR. ESSEX (Gloucestershire, Cirencester): To ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture (Ireland) if he will state the value of Irish exports in the years 1897 and 1907, respectively.

of cattle, sheep, horses, bacon, eggs, and butter.

(Answered by Mr. T. W. Russell.) The Department have no information as to the value of exports in 1897. The following table shows the number of cattle, sheep, and horses exported from Ireland in the years 1897 and 1907 respectively, and the quantities of bacon, eggs, and butter exported in 1907, also the value of the exports in 1907 :—

Postage Rates for Australian Newspapers.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): To ask the Postmaster-General whether any arrangement has been entered into with the Government of the Commonwealth of Australia for the delivery of Australian newspapers in this country for 1d. postage on each newspaper weighing eight ounces; and whether a similar reduction in the postage rate of newspapers will be given from the United Kingdom to Australia.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The Answer to the first part of the hon. Member's Question is in the affirmative, and to the second in the negative.

Closing of Foreland Coastguard Station, Ventnor.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state on what date it was officially decided to withdraw the coastguard from the Foreland, Ventnor division.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The official authority for the closing of the station was given on the 24th November.

Payment of Salaries of Irish National School Teachers.

MR. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that inspectors of national schools in Ireland are paid their salaries monthly while the teachers frequently are not fully paid until the money is six months overdue, and then not directly; whether this is due to deficiency of staff or a bad system at head-quarters; whether he can promise that in future teachers will, like other public servants, be paid their salaries in full regularly and directly every month; and, if this be not done, whether the teachers will be paid interest on arrears of salary.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that inspectors of national schools are paid their salaries monthly. The teachers are paid punctually every quarter, and it is only when there are irregularities in the payment forms or claims of individual teachers that any delay takes place. Teachers cannot be paid monthly, as this would involve a very large increase of staff and a corresponding addition to the Vote. The Answer to the concluding portion of the Question is in the negative.

Indian Telegrams.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON : To ask the Under-Secretary of State for India if he will state the number of words in telegraphic messages, and their value, despatched from India to places outside India during each year in 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906, and 1907, distinguishing those from India itself and trans-Indian messages.

(Answered by Mr. Buchanan.) The reply is given in the following statement:—

	Messages sent from India.		Trans-Indian Messages.
	Words.	Indian Value*	Words.	Indian Value*
		£		£
1903-4 - - -	3,009,365	45,777	4,121,200	54,898
1904-5 - - -	3,450,456	55,833	5,080,407	65,959
1905-6 - - -	3,491,616	52,759	5,119,111	68,459
1906-7 - - -	3 740,423	57,677	4,421,212	60,589
1907-8 - - -	3,997,327	61,848	4,561,908	61,933

* The figures in these columns show the sterling equivalent (at 1s. 4d. the rupee) of the Indian share of the receipts in respect of the messages, as shown in the Administration Report of the Indian Telegraph Department.

Evicted Tenants in County Westmeath.

MR. GINNELL : To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will furnish a list of the bona fide evicted tenants (including representatives of deceased evicted tenants) in Westmeath whose claims are recognised by the Estates Commissioners as valid, but who have not yet been reinstated, showing, in connection with each, the date of eviction, name of the estate from which evicted, whether the evicted farm is now tenanted or not, the reason why not yet reinstated, the purpose of the Commissioners regarding the case, and when they expect to be able to carry out their purpose.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) For the reasons which are fully stated in my reply to a Question asked by the hon. Member for North Armagh on the 8th July, 1907, I am not prepared to furnish the list in question.

Sale of the Estate of John H. Beinn of Creenelea.

MR. F. MEEHAN (Leitrim, N.) : To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-

Lieutenant of Ireland whether the estate of John H. Beinn, of Creenelea, County Leitrim, has been offered for sale to the Estates Commissioners; and, if bought by the Estates Commissioners, will he explain why the agent of the landlord endeavours to collect rents or takes proceedings for recovery of same.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) No proceedings for the sale of the estate would appear to have been instituted before the Estates Commissioners.

Evicted Tenants in County Sligo.

MR. MCHUGH (Sligo, N.) : To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the number of evicted tenants in the county of Sligo, how many of these are in occupation as caretakers; and how many evicted tenants in this county were reinstated or given new holdings during the five years ended the 1st November, 1908.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) : I am not in a position to say how many evicted tenants there are in County Sligo or how many of them are in occupation as caretakers. The Estates Commissioners inform me that of the persons who applied to them for reinstatement, as evicted tenants or the representatives of evicted tenants, thirteen have been reinstated or provided with other holdings, and the cases of twenty-eight others have been noted for consideration in connection with the allotment of untenanted land.

Completion of Sale of the Verschoyle Estate at Tanrago.

MR. MCHUGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether agreements for the purchase of the Verschoyle estate, at Tanrago, Beltra, County Sligo, were signed over twelve months ago; has the sale been completed; and, if not, will he state the cause of the delay.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that the agreements referred to must have been provisional agreements indicating the terms at which the tenants would be prepared to purchase. The estate is pending for sale in the Court of the Land Judge, to whom the Commissioners have made an offer under Section 7 of the Irish Land Act, 1903.

Sale of the Hazelwood Demesne Estate of Owen Wynne.

MR. MCHUGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland how much money has been advanced by the Estate Commissioners for the Hazelwood demesne estate of Owen Wynne, in the rural district of Sligo; is it the practice of the Estates Commissioners to advance money for the sale of demesnes before advances are made for the purchase of the agricultural holdings on estates; what was the average number of years purchase paid by tenants on this estate who signed agreements; and how many tenants on the estate have refused or failed to sign agreements.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have advanced £79,378 for the purchase of the Hazelwood estate, of which £13,564 was advanced in respect of the demesne purchased under Section 3 of the Irish Land Act, 1903. It is not the practice of the Commissioners to advance the purchase-money payable in respect of a demesne before the advances are made for the purchase of the agricultural holdings on an estate. The purchase-money of the 120 holdings on this estate in respect of which advances were made represented an average of 23·9 years purchase. Purchase agreements were not signed in respect of six of the holdings.

Untenanted Lands on the Gore-Booth Estate.

MR. MCHUGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the purchase price for the estate sold to his tenants in the barony of Carbury, County Sligo, at Magherow and Ballintrillick, by Sir Jocelyn Gore-Booth, Baronet, has been advanced by the Estates Commissioners; is he aware that the untenanted land on this estate at Ballintrillick has been offered for sale by the vendor to the Estates Commissioners; how long have negotiations as to the price of the untenanted land been pending in this case; and will he request the Estates Commissioners to acquire these untenanted lands without further delay.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that the purchase money of this estate has not been advanced. The untenanted lands have been inspected, and the Commissioners informed the owner in July last of their estimated price, but they cannot acquire the lands until the negotiations have been completed and the requirements of the statute have been complied with.

Fixing of Second-Term Rents on Joint Holdings.

MR. HAZLETON (Galway, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is competent for joint tenants of a holding, who have had a fair rent fixed by the Court over fifteen years ago, to apply to the Court for the fixing of second-term rents separately on the holding against the wishes of the landlord, who desires the joint tenancy to continue.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I would refer the hon. Member to subsection 4 of Section 5 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896, which would appear to answer his Question in the negative.

Salaries and Allowances of County Inspectors, Royal Irish Constabulary, stationed in County Galway.

MR. HAZLETON: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what are the salaries of the two county inspectors of the Royal Irish Constabulary at present stationed in County Galway; what allowances they received during the financial year, with the cost of the same; and what was the expense incurred by them in mileage and travelling.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The present salary of the county inspector of the East Riding of County Galway is £390 per annum, and that of the county inspector of the West Riding is £450 per annum. The annual allowances in each case are as follows:—lodging, £50; horse, £50; servant, £45; office, £18 5s.; stationery, £10; making a total of £173 5s. The accounts and vouchers showing the expenses incurred by these officers in 1907–8 for subsistence and travelling are before the Comptroller and Auditor-General. The figures are not therefore immediately available.

Charge for Extra Police.

MR. HAZLETON: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland why the average cost of the entire force is taken into account in fixing the rate of charge for extra sergeants and constables in a county, and what bearing it has upon the cost of extra police drafted from one county to another; whether the only extra expenses incurred on account of drafting extra police from one county to another are travelling expenses, subsistence allowances, medical attendance where necessary, and barrack accommodation; and, if so, why is not the charge for such extra police based upon the average of these expenses exclusive of other considerations.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The manner in which the rates of charge referred to in the Question are to be determined is clearly laid down by Section 5 of the Constabulary (Ireland) Act, 1874, to which I would refer the hon. Member.

Acquisition of Lands of Aughacreira and Moydrishian.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state whether the Estates Commissioners have acquired, or are about to acquire, the lands of Aughacreira and Moydrishian, in the parish of Ballymachugh, County Cavan, the property of Mr. William Webb; what is the area of the lands mentioned; and, in view of the fact that the surrounding holdings are uneconomic, will this land be reserved for the evicted tenant on the estate and the small local tenant purchasers who recently signed purchase agreements.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have not acquired the lands referred to in the Question, but they have directed inquiries to be made with regard to the untenanted land owned by Mr. Webb. They are not at present in a position to give the further information asked for.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Admiralty Contracts in Jarrow.

MR. CURRAN (Durham, Jarrow): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware of the nature of the distress due to unemployment now prevailing in Jarrow; and whether he will be able to place any Admiralty orders there at an early date.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. McKenna, Monmouthshire, N.): Messrs. Palmer of Jarrow have tendered for all the recent Admiralty contracts, but have not, up to the present been successful in obtaining an order. Tenders for machinery for a battleship and cruiser are now under consideration.

Navy Rum Supplies.

MR. H. C. LEA (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will grant a Return stating the total number of gallons of rum bought by his Department in each of the last three years; the date of each purchase; the number of gallons bought, and the price per gallon paid on each occasion, and the marks and the names of the ships of the respective parcels involved in these various transactions; will he state whether the whole of these purchases were made by one firm of brokers without competition or tender; and, if so, what reason is adduced for this departure from ordinary procedure in obtaining supplies for a Government Department.

MR. McKENNA: The quantity of rum purchased in London for the Navy in each of the three latest years to date, is as follows—

	Gallons.
1906 - - -	- 400,000
1907 - - -	- 120,000
1908 - - -	- 420,000

Prices and other particulars of Admiralty purchases of supplies of all commodities, are treated as confidential in the public interest, and it is not considered desirable to furnish the information asked for in the second and third parts of the Question. The whole of the purchases were made through one firm of brokers, who obtained offers in the open market without restriction of free competition. There was no departure from the ordinary trade procedure.

MR. H. C. LEA: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Admiralty purchases of rum are carried out by one firm of brokers who accept only one kind—Demerara rum, and that the result of the purchase of large quantities is absolutely to dislocate the whole trade? Will he receive a deputation of people concerned in the market?

MR. McKENNA: I should like notice of that Question.

Isle of Wight Coastguard Stations.

MR. W. F. D. SMITH (Strand, Westminster): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it has been decided to close the Foreland Detachment, Ventnor Division, of the Coastguard on 1st January; whether he is aware that all the men of that detachment have been in the habit of rendering assistance in the saving of life at sea, and whether he will postpone the carrying out of this and similar reductions of the Coastguard until the House has had an opportunity of discussing them.

MR. McKENNA: The detachment was closed as such on the 1st December, but, as stated yesterday, the same number of Coastguard men are retained there. The answer to the second part of the Question is in the affirmative, As I have stated before, the House will have an opportunity of discussing this question early next session, and in the meantime I do not propose to make any reduction of Coastguard stations which would take away Coastguard men from accustomed life-saving work.

MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham): Will these coastguard men be available at all times for life-saving service; and is it contemplated that they may be away from their signalling duties?

MR. McKENNA: They will be just as available as before. Of course, they must not neglect their official duties.

MR. W. F. D. SMITH: Does the right hon. Gentleman recollect that last July he promised no further reductions should be made till next year?

MR. McKENNA: No reductions that would entail a reduction of service for life-saving purposes; I adhere to that.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): How long is it since this detachment was reduced to three men?

MR. McKENNA: I cannot say for certain, but, as far as I am aware, it has always consisted of three men.

Coastguard Conference Report.

MR. W. F. D. SMITH: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the further Report of the Inter-Departmental Conference on the Coastguard has been received by the Admiralty and, if so, whether he proposes to make it public.

MR. McKENNA: The Report has been received and is being dealt with in the Department. The question of publishing it will be considered when the Admiralty are in a position to make a statement upon their policy in the matter of the Coastguard.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.): Shall we have an opportunity of considering the Report before the discussion of next year?

MR. McKENNA: I cannot undertake to publish the Report. I must consider it.

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Horsham): On what grounds does the right hon. Gentleman refuse to publish the Report?

MR. McKENNA: I have not refused; I have said the Admiralty are considering it.

EARL WINTERTON: But on what ground does the right hon. Gentleman refuse to give an undertaking to publish the Report?

MR. McKENNA: Because at present it is under the consideration of the Admiralty.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the advisability of inviting the noble Lord to join the Coastguard?

[No Answer was returned.]

Wages on Admiralty Contracts at Portsmouth.

MR. T. F. RICHARDS (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that Messrs. Morrison and Mason, at Portsmouth, have reduced their labourers' wages from 27s. 9d. per week to 23s. for fifty-six hours, such reduction taking place from 14th September; that they are also deducting from the men's wages 1½d. for tools and 1½d. for doctor; whether they have the consent of the Admiralty for such deductions; whether he is aware that some unions have claimed and been paid by the contractors the wages hitherto paid by the firm, viz. 6d. per hour; whether he is aware that in most towns the bricklayers' labourers' rate is taken as fair, which is always more than that paid on railways, whose wages for plate-layers' labourers are invariably the lowest; and whether he is aware that the comparison cannot be made between these men who are casually employed and the dockyard men for whom his Department claim continuity of employment; whether he has obtained or asked for any information from any of the labour representatives of the trade unions in the district, and, if so, from whom, or whether the information has been obtained from the employers only; and, if so, would he supply a list of those employers.

MR. McKENNA: The firm in question have not reduced labourers' rates, but the hours of work, which were fifty-five and a half per week in September, are at the present time forty-seven. The Admiralty is aware that a deduction is made of 2d. a week per man for medical attendance and 1d. a week for tools. The matter is one over which the Admiralty would have no control unless it could be shown that the deduction constituted an infraction of the Fair Wages Clause. With regard to the later points raised in the Question, I may remind the hon. Member that the terms of the Fair Wages Clause, as set out in the present contract, are as follows: "The wages paid in the execution of the whole of the work shall be those generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district in which the work is carried out. This condition shall apply to all sub-contracts entered into by the contractor in connection with the said works, and the contractor shall procure the insertion of a provision to the same effect in any sub-contract." Upon a representation from the local Trades and Labour Council, the Admiralty, as I stated on Monday, instituted very full inquiry, and came to the conclusion that, on a review of all the circumstances, it could not be said that there had been any infraction of the Fair Wages Clause. I do not think I should be entitled to furnish the hon. Member with the list of employers for which he asks.

MR. T. F. RICHARDS: Can the right hon. Gentleman say at what date the hours were reduced from fifty-six to forty-seven? Has the right hon. Gentleman not had this case under consideration for three weeks, and can he give me no reply to the question whether unions have not claimed and some firms paid 6d. per hour?

Did not the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent successfully demand that in one case ?

MR. McKENNA : Yes, we have had the matter under consideration for three weeks, and the delay has been due to our desire to make the fullest possible inquiry into all the circumstances. I believe—but I am not sure—that the reduction of hours took place last September.

Oats for Army Horses.

CAPTAIN FABER (Hampshire, Andover) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state whether kiln-dried oats are allowed to be issued to Army horses.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington) : Kiln-dried oats are only allowed to be issued to Army horses provided that such oats fully comply with the contract specification in regard to quality, i.e., that the oats must be good, sound, sweet, dry, clean, without any admixture of light or damaged oats, barley, peas, or other grains, and must weigh not less than 30 lbs. per imperial bushel, or in the case of clipped oats, 40 lbs.

CAPTAIN FABER : Is it not the fact that kiln-dried oats have generally been wet oats ?

MR. HALDANE : In anticipation of that Question, I have provided myself with the best opinions I could get, and I will read them. They are:—

Opinion of the Director of Supplies.—Oats grown in this country are kiln-dried only, I believe, when they have become damaged, in which case they would not come under our present specification as being “good, sound, and sweet,” and would be rejected. Foreign oats, especially Russian, are frequently slightly kiln-dried to improve their keeping powers, and this process, if the oats are in good condition, is almost unobjectionable. It is extremely difficult to tell whether a sound oat has been kiln-dried or not, and it would be useless to put a condition into our specification that we could not prove.

Opinion of the Director-General, Army Veterinary Services.—Foreign oats are kiln-dried for safety in transit. Damaged oats are sometimes kiln-dried in order to effect sales. Kiln-drying is an absolutely harmless process. If the grain is damaged, it is chemical changes in the oats, and not kiln-drying which cause disease.

CAPTAIN FABER : But are not wet oats kiln-dried ? That is the point.

MR. FLAVIN : Is it not often very difficult to tell whether or not oats are kiln-dried ?

[No Answer was returned.]

The Inniskilling Dragoons.

CAPTAIN FABER : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state what number of officers have been transferred to the Inniskilling Dragoons from other regiments since October, 1906 ; what special reason exists for transferring so many ; from what regiments were they transferred ; what the rank of each transferred officer was ; and whether, having regard to the hardship thereby inflicted, there is to be any relaxation of the rule whereby an officer has to retire in the event of his not having attained a certain rank by a certain age.

MR. HALDANE : Since October, 1906, seven officers have been brought into this regiment which contained a number of officers who had abnormally short service or were not qualified for promotion. Two captains were transferred, one being promoted to major, four lieutenants, one being promoted to captain, and one second lieutenant. These officers came one from 5th Dragoon Guards, two from Royal Artillery, and four from Northumberland Fusiliers. There is very little likelihood of any of the officers affected by these transfers having to retire for age, the senior captain having fourteen years in which to attain his majority and the lieutenants, other than those brought in, being also proportionately young for their positions.

EARL WINTERTON : In view of the wide difference of opinion that prevails on this subject, will the right hon. Gentleman recommend the Army Council to issue a Memorandum dealing with the whole subject of the transfer of officers of the Line to cavalry regiments?

MR. HALDANE: These things must be decided entirely on the merits of the officers. I cannot say what the standard of qualification should be.

CAPTAIN FABER: Has not the character of the Inniskilling Dragoons been good?

MR. HALDANE: Oh, yes, excellent; but the difficulty arose from the number of officers with abnormally short service or not qualified for promotion.

CAPTAIN FABER: Would it not be better to put the whole service on an equality?

MR. HALDANE said the difficulty would not have arisen had the Inniskillings had their full quota of officers.

Soldiers as Boot-makers.

MR. T. F. RICHARDS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can state the date and year when his Department decided to teach soldiers the trade of Army boot-making; whether he can state how many are usually employed at this work, and how long does it take on the average to make them efficient and what is the usual price per pair of boots produced in this way.

MR. HALDANE: Action was taken on the recommendations of the Committee on the employment of Reserve and discharged soldiers and sailors in 1906. There is no attempt made to teach the trade in its entirety, but only, on the one hand, to give men who have a prior knowledge of the trade an opportunity to acquire further experiences by practising it in their leisure hours, and, on the other hand, to provide elementary instruction for men without such knowledge so that they may become familiar with the implements of the trade and be enabled to carry out repairs. No fixed number of men are under instruction, and no statistics exist to enable me to reply to the last two parts of the Question.

MR. H. C. LEA: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman see his way to give a certain number of men in every regiment an opportunity to learn a trade, so that when the time comes for their discharge they may not be driven into the ranks of the unemployed, after having devoted the best years of their life to the service of their country?

MR. HALDANE'S reply was inaudible.

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the advisability of instructing men in an elementary knowledge of the law, so that they may take up posts in the Law Courts?

MR. HALDANE: No, Sir.

MR. CROOKS: Why not?

Canadian Immigration—Glasgow Boiler-Makers' Grievance.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the fact that boilermakers have recently been engaged in Glasgow by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at specified wages, fare to Quebec being advanced by the Company but to be deducted from these wages; that the written agreements gave a definite engagement for three months, yet within two months these men were forcibly landed again at Liverpool; that when asked for the wages under the agreement, the Canadian Pacific Company, through their agents, W. A. Crump & Son, solicitors, London, deny liability; and, if so, will he say what steps the Colonial Office propose to take so that British subjects may not be thus illtreated and defrauded.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Colonel SEELY, Liverpool, Abercromby): The Secretary of State has no information as to the case referred to, but inquiry will be made.

Workington Conviction for Stealing Coal.

MR. CROOKS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of John James Jelly, heard at the Workington Police Court on 25th November, who was proved to be in great poverty from unemployment and had a dying child, and that there was neither fire nor food in his house, who was sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment for stealing coal of the value of 2s. 2d., the defence being that he could not get a ticket for work and wanted the coppers to buy milk for his child; and will he take steps to reduce the sentence.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): I am making inquiries into this case, but they are not yet completed. I will let the hon. Member know the result.

MR. SWIFT MACNEIL (Donegal, S.): Why not telegraph for the information? This unfortunate man is suffering all the time.

[Caledonian Railway—Owners' Risk.]

MR. PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the case connected with the fish trade of Aberdeen, where a wagon load of fish of about four tons, instead of being despatched when loaded by the Caledonian Railway Company to Glasgow, was shunted to a siding with empty wagons, resulting in a serious loss to the owner of the fish; if he is aware that the railway company disclaim any liability for the loss incurred; and if he will consider the desirability, in view of the frequency of such cases, of introducing next session a Bill dealing with owners' risk notes on the lines of the following Bills of private Members: Railway (Contracts), 1906, Railway Contracts, 1907, Railway and Canal Traffic Bill, 1908, one of which passed its Second Reading in this House.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. CHURCHILL, Dundee): The Board of Trade have invited the observations of the railway company with regard to the particular consignment referred to, and have received a reply of which I am forwarding my hon. friend a copy. The question of the conditions under which traffic is carried at owners' risk is one that has been receiving the careful consideration of the Board, but I am not at present in a position to make any statement on the subject.

MR. PIRIE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that his predecessor in office three years ago called a meeting of chambers of commerce and traders of the country to discuss the whole question? Can the right hon. Gentleman hold out any hope of legislation for next year?

MR. CHURCHILL: I can say nothing as to the work of next year.

MR. PIRIE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this is a non-party question, and that the Bill which passed its Second Reading was introduced by an hon. Gentleman opposite?

MR. CHURCHILL was understood to reply that he was aware of that fact.

Seamen's Boarding Houses.

MR. RENWICK (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is now prepared to appoint a Commission to inquire into the state of seamen's boarding and lodging-houses, and the conditions under which they are conducted; and whether the Board appoints any officer or officers whose duty it is to see that such houses are conducted strictly in accordance with the licences and bye-laws of the local authorities in whose districts they are situated, in view of the fact that sailors and firemen while in port are compelled to lodge in a seamen's boarding or lodging-house.

MR. CHURCHILL: The inquiries referred to in the reply given by me to a Question put by the hon. Member on the 4th ultimo are not yet completed. On their completion, I shall not fail to consider whether any action or further investigation is required, and I shall be grateful if, in the meanwhile, the hon. Member will furnish me with any information he may have in regard to the state of seamen's lodging-houses which will assist me in arriving at a decision. The officers of the Board of Trade have access to licensed seamen's lodging-houses, but the responsibility for the proper control of such houses rests with the local authorities.

Manning of the Mercantile Marine.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON (Middlesbrough): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that a boarding-house keeper was convicted by the deputy stipendiary magistrate at Cardiff on 20th November for having illegally supplied a crew of coloured men on 16th August last, when the British steamer "Cereda" was at the port of Swansea; whether he is aware that the boarding-house keeper, named Spooner, was engaged by the master or over-looker of the "Cereda" to supply the crew; whether he is aware that under Section 111, subsection (2), of the Merchant Shipping Act a person who employs an unlicensed person to engage or supply a crew is liable to a penalty of £20 for each seaman supplied in contravention of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act; and whether, in view of the continued conviction of boarding-house keepers for illegal supply, he will say if it is the intention of the Board of Trade to take any proceedings against the persons who employ boarding-house keepers to contravene the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act.

The following Questions also appeared on the Paper—

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the manning of the British steamer "Ashburton" of 4,445 tons gross; whether he is aware that the men constituting the deck hands were one Frenchman, two Norwegians, one Russian Finn, two Swedes, and two Danes, all of those men being engaged at the Port of Antwerp; whether he is aware that the stokehold hands were Chinamen, seventeen in number, twelve of these Chinese firemen producing no discharges and stating at the time of the engagement that they had previously served on German vessels; and whether he can state if the Board of Trade surveyor's attention was called to the manning of this ship prior to leaving a port in the United Kingdom; and what steps, if any, the Board of Trade intend to take to compel Chinese seamen to produce certificates of discharge at the time of their engagement in the same manner as British seamen are compelled to produce certificates of discharge before engagement.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the British steamer "Lord Derby," of 2,401 net registered tonnage and 3,757 tons gross, only carries six able seamen and one ordinary seaman; whether he is aware that when this vessel is at sea two of the able seamen and the one ordinary seaman are employed on day work, i.e., to work on deck during the day and to be off duty the whole of the night, thereby reducing the effective deck watch during the night to one man steering, one man on the look-out for four hours each, and the officer in charge of the bridge, contrary to the regulations of the Board of Trade of 1897, which provide that in vessels of 800 tons gross there must be six effective deck hands; whether he is aware that the Advisory Committee of the Board of Trade on 13th October last recommended that vessels of 1,500 tons net should carry at least eight deck hands; and whether it is the intention of the Board of Trade to take any proceedings against the master of the "Lord Derby" for failing to maintain, when at sea, a proper and effective watch during the night.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can explain the cause in the delay in issuing the recommendations of the Advisory Committee of the Board of Trade with regard to the scheme of manning put forward by the Advisory Committee with reference to the number of men engaged in the deck department of British steamers, and also with reference to the efficiency of the deck hands; whether he is aware that in ports of Cardiff, Newport, and Barry qualified seamen are finding it difficult to obtain employment, whilst unqualified men are being engaged on board of British vessels; and whether, seeing the length of time which has elapsed since the question has had the attention of the Advisory Committee, he will take steps to see that the matter is dealt with by the Board of Trade at once.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state what further inquiries have been held with regard to the deaths of five Asiatic seamen on board the British steamer "Strombus"; if he can state the reason why, when inquiry is alleged to have been held at Rotterdam with regard to the deaths of the men, the other members of the crew, apart from the officers, were not called upon to make statements as to the cause of the deaths of the Asiatics in question; and whether the Board of Trade are at present retaining the seamen who made serious allegations against the officers of this ship with regard to the alleged ill-treatment of the Asiatics.

MR. CHURCHILL: Inquiry is being made into the matters referred to in this and subsequent questions which stand in the name of my hon. friend on to-day's Paper, and I shall be happy to communicate the result to him in due course.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: May we expect a reply at a very early date?

MR. CHURCHILL: I do not quite know how long it will take to make the inquiries, but I will do my best to accelerate the collection of the information, and will have it circulated with the votes if the hon. Member so desires.

Insurance Against Unemployment.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will lay a translation of the Report of an investigation by the German Imperial Statistical Office into the feasibility of insurance against unemployment, undertaken in conformity with a Resolution of the Reichstag.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Report referred to by my hon. friend, which was published in 1906, is a very large one, consisting of 1,470 folio pages in three volumes. It discusses in great detail all the various experiments made in different countries for the insurance of workpeople against unemployment, but it does not attempt to formulate any proposals. The Report was reviewed at some length in the Board of Trade Labour Gazette of August, 1906. Information upon this subject was published by the Board of Trade in the Report on Agencies and Methods for dealing with the Unemployed in foreign countries [Cd. 2304 of 1904]; and I understand that the Poor Law Commission will also publish a Memorandum, which practically brings that Report up to date as regards this subject. In the circumstances mentioned it does not seem necessary to undertake the lengthy and expensive task of translating the German volumes. They are, however, open to the inspection of the hon. Member at any time.

SIR PHILIP MAGNUS (London University): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the great decrease in the number of young persons in secondary schools who at the present moment are learning German, and will he take steps—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. That has nothing whatever to do with the Question on the Paper.

Wages and Old-Age Pensions.

MR. NICHOLLS (Northamptonshire): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will say if, in the case of a man earning £31 10s. a year when over the age of seventy years, the wages may be divided for pension purposes, and so enable both his wife and himself to secure the old-age pension.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): I am advised that the effect of subsections (1) and (2) of Section 4 of the Old-Age Pensions Act is that the means of a person, being one of a married couple living together in the same house, must be calculated in the same way as the means of a person who is not married, viz., as the amount received or enjoyed by him or her individually, with this exception, that the means of such a person must not be taken as being less than half the joint means of the couple. Hence, if the husband's means are £31 10s. a year, and the means of the wife are nil, the husband's means must be taken at £31 10s. a year and the wife's at not less than £15 15s. a year. The husband would thus be entitled to a pension of 1s. per week, and the wife to a pension of 5s. per week.

MR. CROOKS asked if the right hon. Gentleman had not made a mistake. Had not the £31 to be divided between the two, and would not each be entitled to 5s. a week?

MR. JOHN BURNS: I have not made a mistake. I think it better to confine these Answers to the Law Officer's opinion, which I have now read out.

MR. T. F. RICHARDS: If the income of the man is £31 10s. where does the woman's £15 come from? That is the whole point.

[No Answer was returned.]

Relief Works and Disfranchisement.

MR. CURRAN (Duham, Jarrow): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether men who are employed during this winter on relief works under poor law guardians will be penalised by disfranchisement.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I presume my hon. friend refers to cases in which men receive relief from the guardians and are set to work as a condition upon which the relief is given. In such a case the recipient of the relief would be disfranchised. Of course, where the guardians carry out works and persons are employed for that purpose at wages in the ordinary way, these persons are not disfranchised.

MR. CURRAN: Was it the intention of the Prime Minister to remove disabilities from people who are employed this winter by boards of guardians in stoneyards?

MR. JOHN BURNS: It is well within the recollection of the House that the Prime Minister's pledge and promise, which has been kept, applied to all workmen who were employed through distress committees and not by boards of guardians.

MR. CURRAN: Will those who are employed for a temporary period this winter in stoneyards under boards of guardians be disfranchised?

MR. JOHN BURNS: Yes; I believe they would be.

Inspection of Fever Hospitals.

MR. WATT: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether any independent inspection is made by his Department of fever hospitals managed by public corporations; and, if not, will he see that such inspections are instituted, in view of the fact that the public have necessarily less opportunity of judging of these than in the case of general hospitals.

MR. JOHN BURNS: A fever hospital provided by a local authority would not be inspected by a medical inspector of the Local Government Board in the ordinary course. The responsibility for the proper administration of such a hospital rests with the local authority, though, in some instances, where there has been complaint of mal-administration the Board have caused an investigation to be made. Moreover, where the district of a sanitary authority is inspected by a medical inspector, he would include the hospital of the authority in his inspection. It does not seem to me necessary that any change should be made in the practice in this matter.

MR. WATT: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a number of these fever hospitals were recently found to be in a very unsatisfactory state?

MR. JOHN BURNS: If the hon. Member will give me information I shall only be too pleased to break through the rule and send a medical inspector at once.

Betting Temptations for Post Office Employees.

MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether a Post Office sorting clerk at Walsall is now being prosecuted for an alleged attempt to obtain money fraudulently from a betting agent at Flushing; whether this agent has an English address and was prosecuted by the Crown, and, on being convicted, appealed; whether he dropped the appeal; and whether the Post Office can do anything to prevent him from still carrying on his business through it, and so placing special temptations before Post Office servants.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): A sorting clerk and telegraphist at Walsall has been prosecuted recently for unlawfully attempting to obtain £5 by false pretences from a betting agent at Flushing.

Secondary School and Training College Regulations.

SIR PHILIP MAGNUS (London University): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he intends the education settlement to be produced by the Education Bill to include a settlement of the difficulties that have arisen in the last three years in regard to secondary schools and training colleges; and, in particular, whether, in that event, he intends to make the requisite modifications in the secondary schools and training colleges regulations so that denominational schools and colleges shall receive grants from the Board of Education equivalent to the grants for those provided by the local authority, as will be the case in regard to elementary schools under the settlement embodied in the Bill.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. TREVELYAN, Yorkshire, W.R., Elland): The various points referred to by the hon. Member do not arise under the Education Bill, which deals only with elementary education. If the Bill now under discussion is passed, the position of Nonconformists and others who are now under disabilities in other parts of the public educational system will, no doubt, be affected thereby, but the hon. Member's Questions are hypothetical, and it would be premature for me to give him a definite reply at present.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University): That does not really answer my hon. friend's Question. Are these training colleges and denominational schools to be treated differentially, according to the religious instruction given, or will they henceforth be treated alike as before the year 1907?

MR. TREVELYAN: I cannot add anything to my right hon. friend's Answer.

MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central): Are we to understand that this part of the education question is to remain unsettled?

MR. TREVELYAN: I do not think so.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON: I will put another Question to-morrow.

Walworth Catholic and Council Schools.

MR. C. J. O'DONNELL (Newington, Walworth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he can state, in shillings, what are the present grants per child made from taxes by his Department and from rates by the local authority to the Catholic school at Rodney Road, Walworth, and what are the similar grants per child to council schools in Walworth, and if he can state what are the annual salaries of the head and assistant teachers in this Catholic school and in the Walworth council schools; and whether he can estimate by how much the salaries of the Walworth Catholic teachers will be reduced if the grant from rates is withdrawn.

MR. TREVELYAN: The grants from the Board of Education, in respect of the school named, amount to 38s. per child, and the average grant, in respect of all the council schools in Walworth, amounts to 37s. 8d. per child. I have no information as to the amount spent by the local education authority from sources other than Government grant in respect of the particular school named, or of the council schools in Walworth. The school at Rodney Road is in three departments. The average salary of the head teacher is, I believe, £154 odd, and the average salary of the assistant teachers of various grades is £88 odd; the average salary of the head teachers in the various council schools in Walworth is £241, and of the assistant teachers £122 odd. I have no means of knowing the Answer to the concluding paragraph of the Question.

Attendance in Catholic Schools.

MR. C. J. O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he is aware that, although the average attendance at Catholic schools in England and Wales is only about 300,000 children, the accommodation in them is for 412,669 children; whether, in consequence of the slackness of the local education officials, the attendance is generally slack in Catholic schools; whether the number of children on the rolls is nearly 400,000; and whether he is aware that, including Scotland, nearly 500,000 of Catholic children of school age in Great Britain are about to be deprived of grants from the rates, to which their parents contribute; and what steps the Government proposes to take to safeguard this body of future citizens from being placed in a position of permanent educational inferiority and inefficiency.

MR. TREVELYAN: The average attendance in Roman Catholic schools for the last year for which figures are available was 286,188, and the recognised accommodation was 406,137. I have no reason to suppose that the attendance in Roman Catholic schools is generally slack. The average number on the books in Roman Catholic schools in 1906-7 was 333,403. With regard to the last paragraph, so far as England and Wales are concerned, I beg to refer the hon. Member to the Education Bill now before the House.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): Are we to understand that the average attendance of pupils in Roman Catholic schools compares favourably with the average attendance of children attending other denominational and undenominational schools?

MR. TREVELYAN: I do not think it compares unfavourably, but I can get the figures if notice of the Question is given.

MR. MYER (Lambeth, N.): How many Catholic children are in attendance in Council schools?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am afraid I cannot answer that without notice.

Religious and Moral Instruction.

MR. G. GOOCH (Bath): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether the term religious instruction in Section 1, subsection (2) (b), of the Elementary Education Bill includes systematic moral instruction, whether derived wholly from Biblical sources or not.

MR. TREVELYAN: The point raised in the hon. Member's Question seems to suggest too fine a distinction for ordinary persons who are not theologians to grasp; but so far as I understand what the hon. Member desires in the way of moral instruction, I do not see why any difficulty need arise in regard to it under the Bill.

MR. W. THORNE (West Ham, S.): Does the hon. Gentleman think that Section 1 of the Bill can be carried out without instituting a credal register?

MR. TREVELYAN: I do not think that that arises out of the Question.

MR. W. THORNE: Surely it does.

Religious Instruction Syllabus.

MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education if it is intended that the three-quarters of an hour specified in Clauses 1 and 2 of the Elementary Education (England and Wales) Bill may be occupied in part by the religious observances, viz. the hymn and the prayer, or, additionally, the reading of a passage from the Bible, which at present usually form part of the proceedings of a school during the period assigned to religious education; and if so, will he take steps to make that clear, either in the text of the Bill or by an article in the Day School Code.

MR. TREVELYAN: So far as I understand what it is that the hon. Member wishes to be allowed to take place in the schools, I doubt whether any alteration need be made in the Bill; but I will consider the point.

Teachers and the Fair Wages Clause for Contracting-out Schools.

MR. YOXALL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education if the Fair Wages Clause, invariably inserted in Government contracts, is to be applied to the employment of teachers in contracting-out schools under Clause 3 of the Elementary Education (England and Wales) Bill; and, if so, will he make that clear by amending the text of the Bill accordingly.

MR. TREVELYAN: I am considering in what way it can most satisfactorily be provided in the Bill that the teachers in contracting-out schools shall receive adequate remuneration, to the satisfaction of the Board of Education, regard being had to the rate of salaries paid by local education authorities to teachers in other public elementary schools.

Appeals Against the Allocation of School Grants.

SIR HENRY KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether, in the allocation of grants by an association, formed under Section 3 of the Education Bill, to public elementary schools affiliated to it, any appeal will be allowed from the managers of a school dissatisfied with the proposed grant to the Board of Education, as under the Voluntary Schools Act, 1897.

MR. TREVELYAN: No, Sir.

Education Associations.

SIR HENRY KIMBER: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education how the new associations under Clause 3 of the Education Bill are to be constituted; and will the denomination have full power to form an association as it thinks best or will it be compelled as under the Voluntary Schools Act of 1897, to propose a scheme of constitution for the approval of the Board of Education, whose decision shall be final.

MR. TREVELYAN: The constitution of the association will be determined by the denominations, but will be subject to the approval of the Board of Education.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): Will members of the High, Low, and Broad Church parties be regarded as one denomination or be allowed to have separate associations?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Church of England will have one association.

LORD EDMUND TALBOT (Sussex, Chichester): Will there be any appeal against the decision of the Board of Education?

MR. TREVELYAN: I would rather leave that till the clause is under consideration.

LORD EDMUND TALBOT: But we are under the guillotine.

MR. TREVELYAN: If the hon. Gentleman is dissatisfied, I think he might put down a Question to my right hon. friend.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: Will time be given by the Government on the later stages of the Bill to define more clearly the position of the associations?

MR. TREVELYAN: That is a question for discussion when we come to Clause 3.

Richmond Park.

SIR HENRY KIMBER: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if he will state by whose order and under what authority a portion of Richmond Park is being converted into a nursery garden with pits, entirely altering its character and affecting the amenities of surrounding private residences; and whether he will take steps to obviate or lessen the deterioration which is going on.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. L. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rossendale): A portion of an outlying paddock in Richmond Park is being made into a nursery under my directions. It is absolutely necessary that this nursery should be made in order to provide the shrubs which are required for the Royal Parks. When the initial work is completed I do not think it will be found that the amenities of the houses surrounding the park will be affected.

MR. WATT: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the occupiers of these private residences in the park pay rates towards the upkeep of the park?

MR. L. HARCOURT: I cannot say as to that.

Mall Improvement.

MR. CARR-GOMM (Southwark, Rotherhithe): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether the archway which is now being built in the Mall, over the footway leading to Birdcage Walk, is part of the original scheme for the improvement of the Mall, and if it is intended to build any other white stone arches in St. James's Park.

MR. L. HARCOURT: No archway is being built over the footpath. The gates form part of the Queen Victoria Memorial scheme for the completion of the Mall. It is not proposed to build any arches in St. James's Park.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping): Out of what fund is the money being provided?

MR. L. HARCOURT: Out of the Queen Victoria Memorial Fund.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): Have any turf or trees been lost by putting up these pillars and gates?

MR. L. HARCOURT: Yes. One thorn tree, which I am convinced was dying, has been removed under my direction.

Sheriff Clerks in Scotland.

MR. WATT: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the system of paying sheriff clerks in Scotland is to hand over to them a lump sum from which the sheriff clerks pay their staffs; that no cognisance is taken by the Treasury of how much is paid to sheriff clerk-deputes or to clerks serving under them; that the distribution of this money might often be inequitable without the Treasury becoming aware of it; and, if so, whether he will see the advisability of having the staffs of all the sheriff clerks in Scotland directly associated with the Treasury, with their salaries paid thence, or otherwise that the Treasury take cognisance of the manner in which the lump sums are distributed, so that merit and length of service may always be recognised with fairness.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HOBHOUSE, Bristol, E.): Sheriff clerks in Scotland receive, as a rule, in addition to fixed salaries, lump sum allowances for payment of deputes and clerks, but in some cases the salaries also include allowances. The Treasury do not ordinarily take cognisance of the distribution of an allowance, unless a question arises of the necessity for varying the total amount, but receipts for amounts paid to deputes and clerks are furnished to the King's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer as well as to the Comptroller and Auditor-General. A system of this kind is common to several branches of the public service, and I see no reason for altering the present arrangements.

The Weir Trust.

SIR HENRY KIMBER: I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Barnstaple division, as representing the Charity Commissioners, whether, and when, the Charity Commissioners propose to seal the scheme they are preparing respecting the diversion of the trust fund bequeathed by the late Mr. Benjamin Weir, of Streatham; whether they will afford the Member for Wandsworth and the inhabitants of Streatham, in the borough of Wandsworth, a final opportunity of perusing it before it is actually sealed; and whether they will postpone the carrying out of the scheme until such time as the matter can be debated on some Vote in Supply next session.

MR. SOARES (Devonshire, Barnstaple): The Commissioners propose to seal the scheme on Tuesday next. I will send the hon. Baronet a copy of the scheme to-night. In answer to the last part of the Question, the scheme will be carried out in the ordinary course.

SIR HENRY KIMBER: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that the Charity Commissioners, a body entrusted by Parliament with the performance of specific and statutory duties and paid for the same, are proposing, greatly in excess of the powers conferred upon them by Parliament, to divert a trust fund, bequeathed by the late Mr. Benjamin Weir, of Streatham, to found a medical charity within and for the benefit of the inhabitants of Streatham, in the borough of Wandsworth, to other purposes altogether in another parish and another borough; whether he will direct the attention of the Attorney-General to the subject; and whether he will cause the carrying out of the scheme proposed by the Commissioners to be postponed until such time as the matter can be debated on some Vote in Supply next session.

MR. SOARES (on behalf of the PRIME MINISTER): The statements contained in the first part of the Question are evidently based on incorrect information, and a misapprehension of the nature of the trust. There would be no useful purpose in directing the attention of the Attorney-General to the subject at the present time. The Answer to the last part of the Question is in the negative.

Cambridgeshire Small Holdings.

MR. NICHOLLS (Northamptonshire, N.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he has received any communication from applicants for small holdings at Coates, Cambridgeshire, complaining that the Isle of Ely County Council have not taken steps to provide them land, although the men have sent repeated applications since last January; that recently the small holdings committee have refused to recognise the applications from the Co-operative Small Holdings Association; if he has been asked to send an inspector to Coates to make inquiry into the case; have the applicants urged the Board to exercise their powers under the Act to acquire land for these men; and what steps do the Department intend to take in the matter.

THE TREASURER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Sir EDWARD STRACHEY, Somersetshire, S.): The facts are as stated, and the Board are in communication with the county council on the subject.

Scottish Secondary Schools.

MR. MENZIES (Lanarkshire, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether, in view of the fact that the total number of children in average attendance at secondary schools in Scotland for the year 1904-5 was 16,688 and that they received grants of public money amounting in all to £70,496 11s. 10d., he will explain upon what principle grants to the amount of £80,690 14s. 3d. were given to these same schools for the year 1906-7 when the number of children had only increased by 240, making a total of 16,928; and whether this increased grant of £10,000 is reasonable, as it amounts to £40 per child in increased average attendance.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): The particulars of grants paid to secondary schools in the year 1906-7, as given on page 41 of the Report on Secondary Education, comprise a number of payments made in respect of two years, as explained in a footnote. The figures given by the hon. Member do not make allowance for this fact and therefore require considerable modification. Apart from this, however, the amounts of these grants were not determined by average attendance. They were derived from three sources, two of which provide fixed sums to be distributed annually as nearly as may be in their entirety for the benefit of secondary schools. The grants for science and art paid by the Department, which formed the third source of income of these schools, were determined by the amount and quality of the work done.

Lawlessness in the West of Ireland.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government sent Mr. Horne, late resident magistrate, to the West of Ireland to report upon the condition of that part of the country, especially in regard to lawlessness; and, if so, will they lay the Report of Mr. Horne upon the Table.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): As stated in my reply to a Question asked by the hon. and gallant Member for East Down on 4th March last, Mr. Horne was employed in County Galway for ten days in the month of January last. His communication to the Government was of a strictly confidential nature, and will not be published.

Cahiriveen District Council and Fairs.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the terms of the resolution passed by the Cahiriveen Rural District Council on the 11th ultimo. to the effect that it is advisable that rural district councils should have equal powers with urban councils to regulate the holding of fairs and markets; and whether he proposes to give effect to this resolution.

MR. BIRRELL: My attention has been called to the resolution referred to. Under Section 1 of the Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1896, a rural district council can be invested by the Local Government Board with the powers of an urban authority for any of the purposes of the Public Health Acts. Under those Acts urban authorities have certain powers with regard to markets, and the Board are prepared to consider an application from the rural district council to be invested with such powers.

Saurine Estate, Tipperary.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have yet advanced the cash for the purchase of the Saurin Estate, Lisballyard, County Tipperary; and, if not, what is the cause of the delay.

MR. BIRRELL: This estate will be dealt with by the Estates Commissioners in its order of priority. Its turn has not yet been reached.

Irish Land Purchase Compulsory Powers.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland which clause of the Irish Land Bill restricts or limits the power, conferred upon the Land Commission by Clause 31, of acquiring land compulsorily outside the congested districts area; and whether it is intended that this power of compulsory purchase is to be exercised solely for the purpose of dealing with cases of congestion.

MR. BIRRELL: Clause 44 of the Bill contains general restrictions on the compulsory acquisition of land under the Bill. Clause 31, which lays down the procedure to be adopted by the Land Commission preliminary to compulsory acquisition, is limited to land which is not situated in a congested districts county. The power of acquiring such land is not confined to cases of congestion, but doubtless the most urgent cases of this kind would be the first to be dealt with by the Land Commission.

Rosse Estate Evicted Tenant.

MR. REDDY (King's County, Birr): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what steps have been taken by the Estates Commissioners to reinstate an evicted tenant named Rose Egan on the property of Lord Rosse at Clonllyn Castle, King's County, the agent having told Rose Egan that he was willing she should be reinstated by the Commissioners.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners inform me that this holding has been inspected and that they have intimated to the owner the price which they are willing to advance for the purchase of the evicted farm, provided the evicted tenant is reinstated and signs a purchase agreement.

Marsham Estate Evicted Tenant.

MR. F. MEEHAN (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have taken any steps to reinstate Mrs. Anne McHugh, an evicted tenant on the Marsham estate, Killavoggy, County Leitrim, she having signed the necessary agreement for purchase in May last and for the preservation of the plantations, in compliance with the terms of the Commission; and whether, having regard to the fact that the young plantation on the farm was being destroyed, the Commissioners would take immediate action to have her reinstated.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners have had the lands inspected and have intimated to the owner the price which they are prepared to advance for the purchase of the evicted farm. It is understood that the owner is about to reinstate Mrs. McHugh, who has agreed to purchase.

Irish Equivalent Grants.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Irish Development Grant was made to Ireland as an equivalent of the increased education grants to England and Wales under the Education Act of 1902; and whether he is able to state the amount which Ireland should receive as the equivalent of the increased grants to English and Scotch education, under Acts subsequent to 1902 or contemplated under the Education Bills now before Parliament.

MR. HOBHOUSE: My right hon. friend has asked me to reply to this Question. With respect to the first part of the Question I would refer the hon. Member to a reply given by my predecessor to the hon. Member for West Kerry on 14th March last. I will send him a copy. As regards the last part of the Question I am not aware of any reason for increasing the grants for education in Ireland, in connection with the English Education Bill or otherwise, as practically the whole cost of elementary education in Ireland is already borne on Votes of Parliament.

MR. LONSDALE: Has not the equivalent grant to Scotland been largely increased?

MR. HOBHOUSE: If the hon. Member will give me notice I will inquire.

Kingstown Pier Dispute.

MR. MOONEY (Newry): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that, since 1st April last, the steamers of the London and North-Western Railway Company have been using the Carlisle Pier, Kingstown Harbour, without making any payment for the use thereof, while the only other steamers allowed to use this pier are the mail steamers of the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, which has to pay a sum of £2,000 per annum for the use of this pier, he will state on what grounds the Treasury charge an Irish company this heavy annual sum for the accommodation provided, while, at the same time, they allow an English Company to use the pier without any payment; and if he can state how long it is intended to discriminate against an Irish company in this manner.

MR. HOBHOUSE: The hon. Member is under a misapprehension. The amount paid by the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company is £182 5s., not £2,000 per annum. The amount to be paid by the London and North-Western Railway Company has not yet been decided, pending a decision on the legal questions which have been raised by the City of Dublin Company.

MR. MOONEY: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that under the contract between the City of Dublin Company and the Postmaster-General, the Postmaster-General stops a sum of £500 per quarter out of the passenger receipts of the Company for the use of this pier, and whether that does not amount to a charge of £2,000 per annum for the use of the pier? Am I to understand that because there is an action between the company and another Department in connection with the interpretation of the contract that is considered a reason for allowing another person to come in and use the pier free of charge?

MR. HOBHOUSE said the facts were as stated in his reply.

MR. MOONEY: Will the hon. Gentleman cause a copy of the contract to be placed before him so that he may see whether it is not a fact that £500 per quarter is taken out of the passenger receipts of the company and paid over to the Treasury? Are we to understand that in addition to that there is an annual sum charged by way of rent?

MR. HOBHOUSE: No. I am not aware of that. I understand that 5s. per trip is charged and that this sum averages £182 5s.

MR. MOONEY: The hon. Gentleman is quite wrong, and I will put down another Question so that he may see it.

MINISTER FOR EDUCATION AND QUESTIONS.

MR. LYTTELTON (St. George's, Hanover Square): May I ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that eight Questions were to-day put to the Minister for Education relating to the Bill now being discussed under the Closure Resolution as to some of which the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board stated he could not take the responsibility of answering, and whether the Prime Minister is aware that the Answers to some of these Questions are of crucial importance in forming a right judgment upon the policy of the Bill, and will he be good enough to make arrangements—I know there are difficulties—that the Minister for Education, or some responsible Minister, shall be present at Question-time during the progress of this Bill.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): There is no man in this House who, at this moment, is so hardly worked. I believe I am not exaggerating when I say that he has not had twenty-five minutes to-day to himself. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Board was present, and he answered the Questions, but he refused to answer some Supplementary Questions. Under the circumstances this treatment of the Under-Secretary is somewhat ungenerous.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the advisability of withdrawing the Education Bill in view of the result of the Chelmsford election?

MR. ASQUITH: No, Sir.

EDUCATION BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. EMMOTT (Oldham) in the Chair.]

Clause 2:

*MR. MILD MAY (Devonshire, Totnes) said that when he was interrupted by the adjournment of the Committee last night he was in process of moving the omission of the words "on two mornings in the week in which school meets," with the result that if the omission were accepted the opportunities given to a child of receiving denominational religious instruction would not be confined to two mornings in the week. He had been refreshing his memory by reading the report of what was said on the subject yesterday by the Prime Minister, who told them that the right of entry was not to be confined to two days a week, but that no individual child would be at liberty to receive denominational teaching on more than two days a week. It appeared to many of them that that was a very meagre allowance. He would ask hon. Members opposite to remember that they had conceded the principle that children were to have the opportunity of receiving denominational teaching in all schools, and they had also conceded that the presence of denominational teachers was not to be restricted to two days a week. Then what reason could there be for preventing children from receiving religious education in accordance with the wishes of their parents on more than two days in the week? He had never upheld the extreme denominational point of view, because he believed that religious teaching of value to the children, so far as it went, could be imparted under the Cowper-Temple Clause. Although he thought that religious teaching of value to children was possible, and was given in some schools under the Cowper-Temple Clause, yet he did not ignore the fact—they had all got to recognise the fact—that there was a large body of people in the country who took the contrary view, conscientiously and honestly believing that such teaching, if not harmful, was absolutely valueless. They might not be able to understand that view, but those who held it had a perfect right to it, and it was perfectly certain that that view was honestly held. No man had a right to dictate to another man what should be his views in this connection, where deep religious convictions were concerned. No suggestion could be more illiberal. And so, if they were to have a settlement, one fact must be recognised by the hon. Gentlemen opposite, and it was an important fact in connection with this provision for the right of entry. What had been the chief complaint of the Nonconformists in connection with their opposition to the Bill of 1902? What had impelled them to passive resistance? It was that they had been forced, and they said it was an insupportable injustice, to pay for religious teaching of which they did not approve. How did they propose to remedy this state of affairs under the Bill? And here was the fact which he wished to impress upon them. They proposed to remedy it by shifting the same grievance, which by their own admission had been intolerable, on to other shoulders; they proposed to remedy it by compelling others to pay for religious teaching of which those others did not approve. And when hon. Gentlemen opposite said that this was not a balanced settlement, that the concessions did not balance, that the sacrifice required by the Church was small, he would ask them to recall to their minds the violent terms in which they had characterised that bondage which, under this Bill, they were now light-heartedly seeking to impose on others. How came it that anyone with a sense of justice was willing to discuss or entertain for a moment this solution which would appear to be so obviously unjust? It was only because it was hoped that the quid pro quo, the right of entry into all schools, would be no shadowy concession, but a concession of a substantial and really valuable nature. He had to admit that he was speaking from the point of view of members of the Church of England. This concession of right of entry was no good to Roman Catholics, and in this sense, from their point of view, the solution was most unsatisfactory. Returning to the English Church point of view, it appeared to him that under this Bill, whereby children whose parents so desired were to have one-and-a-half hour's denominational religious teaching in the week, the right of entry as a concession was lacking in substance. They had conceded the right of entry, and, the principle once conceded, was it not politic from every point of view to be ungrudging in the application of that principle? There was another matter. Many of them were strangers to some of the fears which were entertained by extremists in connection with this Bill, but if they were to allay those fears—if they were to get a lasting settlement—they must endeavour to understand those fears, and must give consideration to those hypothetical cases which were suggested by extremists in all sincerity, even if the possibility of such cases occurring might seem to them very remote. Under the Bill, as he had said, the children of parents so desiring were to have denominational instruction for two periods of three-quarters of an hour in the week. What if the headmaster of the school was a man of forceful character, and for one reason or another was strongly antagonistic to the denominational teaching in his school, or to the teacher thereof? If not a probability, was it not a possibility that he might set himself in the remaining three days of the week to give religious teaching to put it mildly, in no sense in sympathy with the denominational teaching? Was it not possible that he might set himself in the remaining three days to counteract this teaching? It might be said that it was not probable, but none could say that it was impossible, and how disagreeable would be the position. It might be asserted that the parent would have his remedy in the withdrawal of his child from the Cowper-Temple teaching under the conscience clause, but the result of this would be that the child would be penalised by receiving only one and a half hour's religious instruction in the week, a very meagre allowance. He submitted that his Amendment alone would solve such difficulty. The Prime Minister yesterday said that the Bible-teaching given in Church schools on three days a week was an excellent basis on which to superimpose Church teaching, and further, that it had been an almost universal system in Church of England schools to give three days ordinary Bible-teaching, and on the remaining two days distinctive denominational teaching, and that it had worked well. Yes, it had worked well where all religious teaching had been given by the same teacher, or under the same superintendence, but it must be remembered that in future this religious instruction in the schools was to be given by two independent teachers. They were not allowed to inquire into the religious opinions of the headmaster before he was appointed, and they did not know what his religious views might be, or what might be his qualifications even for giving the teaching which it was his duty to give, under the Bill, under the Cowper-Temple clause, and under those circumstances was it not possible that the two teachers of religion in the school might be teaching one against the other? Everyone in that House, he thought, would agree that that would be a most deplorable position. The Prime Minister said yesterday that Cowper-Temple teaching was an excellent basis on which to superimpose Church teaching. Yes, but what security had they that Cowper-Temple teaching as now given in the schools would endure? What guarantee was there that in the future it would not be supplanted by religious teaching absolutely valueless, and even pernicious in their eyes? Who knew what Governments might be in power in the future? Was it absolutely impossible that they should see something as uninspiring to children as the New Theology, or perhaps, ethical teaching with strong socialistic tendencies, installed in the schools as the State idea of what religious teaching should be? At all events, with the possibility of the future before them, they had a right to ask that the benefits to be conceded by the right of entry should be real and substantial benefits. He would detain the House no longer; as he had already said, the Government and their Nonconformist supporters had conceded the principle of the right of entry, and he most earnestly appealed to them to apply this principle ungrudgingly by accepting his Amendment, because it would only make for peace. He believed the acceptance of the Amendment would do more to pacify a large body of Churchmen than any Amendment which was not contrary to the principle of the Bill.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 26, to leave out from the word 'instruction,' to the word 'make,' in line 27."—(Mr. Mildmay.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'on' stand part of the clause."

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir W. ROBSON, South Shields) said he understood the hon. Member's Amendment was directed to the time-limit of two mornings a week, although he had argued beyond that point. The two mornings a week which were provided for by the clause represented, not any arbitrary time picked on by the Government as being what the framers of the Bill thought sufficient, but a time which, by almost universal consent, had been found adequate by those desirous of giving denominational instruction in the schools. Denominational instruction did not cover the whole ground of religious instruction, even in denominational schools. He was quite sure that hon. Members opposite, so far as Protestants were concerned—he said nothing about those of the Roman Catholic faith—would recognise that the teaching ordinarily given as Cowper-Temple teaching was in a large part such as was also ordinarily given as religious instruction in denominational schools, but it was not the whole of the religious instruction given in denominational schools, and was therefore defective in that respect. But whatever the differences between the different Protestant denominations might be, there was a considerable amount of religious instruction which was common to all. They all knew that in Church schools and undenominational schools the Bible was taught very much on the same lines, and therefore that teaching was common to both the denominational and the undenominational schools as at present constituted. But, dealing only with the catechetical teaching, it had been found sufficient in practice in the denominational schools to confine that catechetical teaching practically to half an hour on two mornings in the week, and in many schools on only one morning in the week. Why had that been done? Not because the State put any limit upon the time; nor because the teacher who gave religious instruction was in any way stunted by the authorities. Not at all. It was found that half an hour of catechetical teaching on two mornings a week was adequate for the purpose, and perhaps would give as much as a child of tender years could conveniently assimilate. The denominational schools had themselves made the limit, and the Government had, therefore, adopted it. He would not like to speak as to the course of the negotiations between the exalted persons whose names had been raised in that debate and his right hon. friend, because he could not speak with anything like authority, but he thought he would be right in saying, from what had appeared in the public Press, that those who had assumed to act on behalf of the Church in all these arrangements had not made any very strenuous claim for more time than that which was given in the Bill. He did not know that they had made any claim for more time, but if they had made any, certainly it had not forced its way—

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): So far as the published correspondence goes, no one has assumed to act on behalf of the Church.

SIR W. ROBSON said he did not think he was contending that anybody had acted on behalf of the Church. He said they were assumed to act on behalf of the Church, and he thought the noble

Lord himself not infrequently assumed to act on behalf—

LORD R. CECIL: Never.

SIR W. ROBSON said that at any rate the noble Lord had spoken on behalf of the Church there and had assumed a degree of almost pontifical authority, and one might allow, therefore, some authority to the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London. They at all events did not seem to have laid any very great stress or insistence upon the extension of the proposed time, and under those circumstances he thought they might fairly adopt the existing usage and stand by it. The mover of the Amendment went further, in his speech, than the question of time. He spoke of the possibility that the Cowper-Temple teaching might counteract the denominational teaching, that they might have in the room where Cowper-Temple teaching was being given some theological proposition or spirit inculcated which was not consistent with that going on in another room under the care, it might be, of an Anglican teacher. The same observation might be made, however, with regard to the Anglican teacher and the Cowper-Temple teacher. It might be possible that he would inculcate doctrines in one room highly inconsistent with those taught in another room under the right of entry; but it was not for the State to try to prevent the various religious denominations from trying to counteract each other. Undoubtedly they would seek to counteract each other; they must have the liberty to counteract each other, and the State certainly could not assume to prevent them. It would be a very undesirable course if they were to try in any way to limit the authority that any denomination might claim to possess in teaching doctrines inimical to others.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) said that this was one of the matters which he raised at the opening of the debate yesterday, in reply to which the Prime Minister made on the whole a very considerate speech. He thought the learned Attorney-General misconceived the point made by his hon. friend. It was perfectly true that if they admitted denominational teachers of different denominations into the same school, those teachers in their denominational classes would give teaching which in the different classes was inconsistent, but that was an entirely different thing from what his hon. friend said. It was the possibility that the school teacher giving the ordinary Cowper-Temple teaching might give something which was not what the learned Attorney-General described as the Cowper-Temple teaching, as having the fundamental basis of all Christian, or at any rate of all Protestant, teaching, but something which was inconsistent with the denominational super-structure which it was the object of this clause to allow the denominations to build up.

MR. WALTERS (Sheffield, Brightside): Why not?

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: Could the hon. Gentleman really inquire why not? He did not know whether the hon. Member was a supporter of the Bill and desired to see a compromise effected. But his observation struck at the root of all compromise. Could the hon. Gentleman defend the proposition that for three days in the week the child should be subject to teaching subversive of the doctrines in which the parent believed, and then on two days a teacher should come in to counteract that subversive teaching? Surely that was not the doctrine of the Liberal Party?

MR. WALTERS asked to be allowed to explain the object of his interjection. Suppose for example the Cowper-Temple teacher in his teaching took exception to the Anglican or Roman Catholic view on the Apostolic succession, would that not be Cowper-Temple teaching and yet destructive of a peculiar doctrine of the Anglican Church? Would the right hon. Gentleman say that teaching under the Cowper-Temple syllabus could be given without coming into collision with the doctrines of certain sections of the Anglican Church?

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said he certainly took direct issue with the hon. Member. He was not a denominationalist, as the Committee knew by this time. He took direct issue as to what was permissible under the Cowper-Temple clause. If he was wrong and the hon. Member was right, then the Cowper-Temple clause was not the protection to anyone which the Government held it out and the country believed it to be; and it would be impossible to proceed with a Bill based on the Cowper-Temple clause. The Cowper-Temple clause, according to the Attorney-General, provided for the teaching of religious truths not specifically characteristic of any particular Church, but did not provide for teaching in an aggressive form against the doctrine of any particular Church.

SIR W. ROBSON: Antagonistic teaching on the part of the Cowper-Temple teacher against some particular doctrine of a denomination would be clearly contrary to the spirit of the compromise.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said that unless that was understood and clearly embodied in the law, compromise became impossible. He deplored the intolerant spirit shown by the hon. Member for Brightside in his explanation.

MR. WALTERS said he was entitled to protest against language of that kind. He asked to be allowed to substitute another illustration. Suppose, in giving Cowper-Temple teaching common to all sections of the Christian faith, some doctrine should be inculcated that was antagonistic to the Unitarian faith; would that be considered as narrow-minded, intolerant, fanatical, and destructive of compromise?

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said he felt certain that if a teacher in a school in which there were children belonging to various denominations, in giving simple Bible-teaching such as was contemplated by the Cowper-Temple clause, took advantages of his opportunity and the trust confided in him to undermine the child's belief in his parents' religion, it would be an act of the grossest intolerance and a grave breach of trust. He was astonished to hear the hon. Member defend or recommend any such action, and was glad to think that teachers had a better sense of the responsibility of their position. The point which his hon. friend had submitted to the Attorney-General had reference to a fear that that might happen which apparently the hon. Member for Brightside would be prepared to defend. He did not himself believe that it would be largely done; but after the interruption from the hon. Gentleman, did not the Attorney-General see that the fear which existed was not altogether unreasonable? In the great bulk of the denominational schools at the present time, no more time was occupied in this instruction than the Government allowed in the Bill, but probably there would be some schools where further facilities would be desired, and what possible offence could it give to any sensitive Nonconformist to allow such facilities? It might be thought that the concession asked for would not really be of any use, but in making a bargain, was it not wise to give up that which involved no sacrifice on their own part?

*MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.) said it was not the case that in the past in the board schools the teachers had in connection with Cowper-Temple teaching insisted on those points on which Christians had divergent views. In his experience they had dwelt almost exclusively on those points on which all denominations concurred. He had sought and sought in vain for any cases of intolerance in the teaching under the Cowper-Temple clause. He knew that many such charges had been made, but they had never been substantiated. It was not his business to defend the Bill, or to support the Government in this controversy; but still he must say that there was no need for the apprehension shown on the one side or the other; because, he believed, whether the teaching was that of theological religion or that of the common denominator of Christian faith, the teachers would discharge their duty with honesty, fairness, and discretion. While it might be possible to arrange for the right of entry on two days of the week, if they extended it to three, four, or five days a week, it would be disastrous from an administrative point of view, and would interfere seriously with the work of the school.

He was sure that if the Amendment were adopted it would defeat in practice the very aim which the hon. Member had theoretically in view. It might be possible, and he thought it would be possible, to arrange for this teaching two days a week without interfering with the administration of the school, but if hon. Gentlemen wanted to have three or four days a week they would go far to wreck the work of the institution, and if they desired that on four or five days a week certain children should be taught religion it would break down. [Cries of "Why?"] If he knew anything about the working of a school he said that would be the case. [Cries of "We want to know why."] Hon. Members would excuse him from explaining at great length to the Committee the many reasons why the arrangement would not work, and if they did not accept his view he could not help it.

MR. MILDMAY said he did not question the hon. Gentleman's right to speak with authority on this matter, but he was only anxious for information. He confessed he knew less than the hon. Member about these things.

*MR. YOXALL said the localities would have to arrange for the use of a certain room or rooms, and for the services of certain teachers. It might be possible, without infringing upon the general convenience or work of the school, to set a room or two rooms apart for one day or two days a week, but it would become increasingly difficult with each additional day, and it would become impossible for three, four, or five days a week. For a similar reason it might be possible to arrange for the service of a special teacher on two days a week, but it would be much more difficult to arrange for the curate or lay teacher to come into the school on four or five days a week.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): He can go in now under the Bill.

*MR. YOXALL said the teaching could be given by an outside teacher. The two days might not interfere with the efficiency of the school, but if it was three, four, or five days it would very seriously interfere with the work, and the whole system would break down. He would like, in the name of the general efficiency of the schools and the system of education in this country, to protest against any extension of what was now offered. Then they were going to provide for religious teaching of a specified kind for three-quarters of an hour. He put it to any man whether he did not think that a three-quarters of an hour sermon once a week was too long, and certainly twice a week was too long, unless the preacher was very able and entrancing. He put it to those who regarded this matter from the point of view of humanity and the religious interests of the children, and not on theological grounds, whether three-quarters of an hour was not too long on even one day a week for a religious lesson. In not a single council school at this moment was there a three-quarters of an hour lesson of this kind, and this Bill would completely destroy the present system, because it would give the parent the right to claim the actual teaching of dogmatic subjects for three-quarters of an hour on two days in each week. He protested against three-quarters of an hour for any lesson whatever. It was bad educationally, and there was no reason whatever for it. Three-quarters of an hour lesson for children of tender age was much too long. There was not an expert who would not tell them that three-quarters of an hour was too much on one subject at a time. A good deal of the effect of the teaching would be disastrous, and would certainly be not beneficial to the religious life of the children. He hoped the Government would make it clear that the three-quarters of an hour should contain at least the same ten minutes which was now occupied in religious observances in the morning, and if they would not do that, and the Bill passed in its present form, three-quarters of an hour was too much on two mornings, and to make it three, four, or five mornings in the week would be perfectly absurd. He protested against this application to the children of the poor and the working classes of rules and regulations and principles of lessons which were never used in the schools of the upper classes. Who were the men who were supporting this proposal?

Mr. Yoxall.

What was the length of their theological lessons at Eton and Harrow? How much of their time per day did they spend in school and college chapels? [AN HON. MEMBER: More than that.] He knew better. They escaped from it whenever they could, and yet these were the men who came there and demanded that by law they should impose on children in the people's schools a length of theological teaching which they never experienced, and from which they escaped on every possible occasion. The parents of the children and the children had never grumbled at the present system, but, on the contrary, had expressed the greatest satisfaction with it, and he protested against this proposal in every possible way.

LORD EDMUND TALBOT (Sussex, Chichester) said that this question of two mornings a week was one of very great importance to the enormous number of Church of England schools in the division which he had the honour to represent in this House, but it was also a question of importance to the Catholics of the country, though, comparatively speaking, a very minor matter indeed. But it often happened in places where a new trade was started, or a new mine was opened, or there was the development of a new seaside resort that some of his co-religionists went there to start businesses, and for some time they were unable to provide themselves with schools, and in these places, of course, they would want to take full advantage of these two mornings a week. He wanted to have it clearly understood, and therefore he put a definite question to the hon. and learned Attorney-General, whether it was not a fact that it would be possible for the priest and the parson to get into a council school every day in the week? He understood that was so.

SIR W. ROBSON said that, as he understood, the noble Lord was showing that the religious instruction might be on any morning of the week. That was so, provided that no child got more than two mornings a week. The limit of two mornings a week was for the child and not for the school. Each child was to get two mornings a week, and if he did the law was satisfied.

LORD EDMUND TALBOT inquired whether it would be possible for the priest and the parson to get into the Council schools every day in the week, provided they did not teach the same child more than twice in the same week. If that was so, surely it could not do much harm if they let them teach the same child a little oftener.

*MR. MASSIE (Wiltshire, Cricklade) said the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Worcestershire had approached them on this occasion, and the spirit in which he had approached the question on other occasions, made them most anxious to give him what he desired. But he ventured to submit that he did not fully appreciate the state of things which this compromise was already creating. That might be described as a state of irritation in many neighbourhoods, an irritation, not on the part of Nonconformists only, but on the part of many citizens who belonged to no Church whatever, because the schools, of whose freedom from clerical interference they had been proud, were now likely to be handed over for a certain time in the course of the week to that clerical interference; and even if this was only in private rooms, they strongly objected to it. It was very natural, therefore, that many Members of the House should desire to make that irritation as slight as possible. The fact that two days were being offered in the Bill was, as he had said, already creating friction. That offer had been made at a great cost to many of them, because even with two days only they were giving away the highly valued freedom of the schools from the atmosphere of religious differences. They did not desire, and he was quite sure that a vast number of people in the country connected with the council schools did not desire, the intrusion into these schools of denominational teaching. It interfered with the unity of the schools. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Worcestershire had not in the slightest degree exaggerated the honourableness with which the teachers in the council schools had carried out the spirit of Cowper-Templeism. If Cowper-Templeism had done nothing else, it had created in these schools a public opinion, on the part of the teachers, in favour of due respect for the religious convictions of the parents whose children they were teaching. Two days a week was the price that they were preparing to pay, and a high price too, for peace outside the schools. Five days a week would immeasurably increase the price. The price was already high, and they could not pay more.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash) said the last speaker talked about the spirit of conciliation and compromise. He thought if hon. Members wished to preserve that spirit they would have to muzzle the hon. Member for Nottingham, because if he made many more speeches in the same vein as he had adopted that evening—a vein which he should not endeavour to copy—the spirit of compromise would disappear.

MR. YOXALL: I voted against the Bill.

MR. LANE-FOX said he was perfectly aware of that, but whether he supported or opposed the Bill, he had no right to deal with the matter in the spirit in which he thought he had dealt with it. The hon. Member told the Committee that the system suggested by the Amendment was impossible, but beyond that he gave very few and insufficient reasons for it. But the noble Lord had pointed out—and this was proved beyond all doubt—that this teaching could be given, and was given, every day. The whole mistake which underlay this question was pointed out by the hon. Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield. Cowper-Temple teaching was not a definite teaching of any kind; it was merely a negative form of teaching.

MR. WALTERS: I must ask the hon. Member not to put into my mouth so absurd a proposition as that.

MR. LANE-FOX did not suggest the hon. Member said that. That was his own statement. Cowper-Temple instruction merely embodied a negative form of teaching, and, therefore, they were bound to get an opportunity for all sorts of teaching under the Cowper-Temple

Clause. He believed that if a man wished he could teach Ritualism or give mere Bible-reading under that clause, so long as he did not embody it in a dogmatic form. That was the objection of Members of the Opposition. That was the reason they said that there was no guarantee that there would not be a conflict between the teaching given on one day under the Cowper-Temple Clause, and the teaching given on another day in a denominational form. It was impossible for the Government to lay down the principle that nothing taught under the Cowper-Temple Clause would conflict with the teaching given in a denominational form on another day. Hon. Members had no right to assume that the teaching required by those who supported the Amendment was purely the catechism. Everybody must recognise that what they wanted was not to impress dogma on children every morning, but to give teaching with a guarantee that behind it would be found that well-founded and genuine belief which was not to be found under the Cowper-Temple clause.

MR. J. W. WILSON (Worcestershire, N.) said that the special teaching on two days a week was regarded as one of the distinctive features of the compromise which they understood was arrived at, and he thought he had some right to submit that to the consideration of the House, because the last time the matter was discussed in the House two years ago, he moved an Amendment for doing away with the two days and allowing special instruction to be given on every day of the week. It was argued then that probably it would make no difference in the long run, and that two days a week would be ultimately all that would be required, and, therefore, by conceding five days they were doing no more than if they conceded only two days, because the remaining three would not be used. He submitted that in this case it concerned not the transferred schools, but it mainly affected the great board schools of the country. He thought the President of the Board of Education was justified in concluding that the main body of board school educationists would regard the giving up of restrictions regarding the five days as a far greater concession than giving up two only. Therefore, he appealed to those Members who desired to support the Bill to consider this as a question already decided, and to occupy the limited time of the Committee with those matters which were more open to criticism, and possibly to amendment.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University) said the speech of the hon. Member for Brightside had convinced him that it was necessary that he should support the Amendment. He had always felt the Cowper-Temple teaching had admitted the expression of dogmatic theological opinion, but they had always been assured—and he believed it was generally though not universally the case—that Cowper-Temple teaching consisted of those fundamental Christian truths, common certainly to all the Protestant creeds and common, he believed, to the Roman Catholic Church, though they could not accept that particular form of presentation, and that therefore it might very properly be a foundation on which the two days' denominational teaching might be given. But, if it was suggested, as it was by an hon. Member who had had considerable experience in educational matters, that Cowper-Temple teaching might properly be used to counteract and undermine the denominational teaching which was given to the child on two days of the week, then it appeared to him that the parent should be safeguarded by the permission to insist that his child should receive the denominational teaching on all the five days of the week on which religious instruction was given. In that way only could he be guarded against conflicting religious opinion, contradictory to the tenets of the parent, and profoundly repugnant to his wishes. If there was any risk that this teaching might be given in a controversial spirit and in a way contrary to the wishes of many of the parents, was it not desirable that this teaching should be given under some form of supervision and inspection that should ensure to the parents that their children were not taught on three days a week doctrines that were subversive of what they were taught on the other two days?

*MR. NAPIER (Kent, Faversham) thought that this Amendment was contrary to the scheme of the Bill and to the spirit of compromise behind it.

The stipulation that there should be in all schools compulsory Cowper-Temple teaching was not a stipulation made by the Nonconformists. It came from the Archbishop of Canterbury, who insisted on Cowper-Temple teaching being given by the local education authority to the whole of the children of the country, subject, of course, to the conscience clause. The stipulation was that there should be Cowper-Temple teaching on three days of the week, and specific Church teaching on the other two days. That meant that Cowper-Temple teaching was not inconsistent with Church teaching, and nine-tenths of the people of the country believed the Cowper-Temple teaching did include the fundamental principles of Christianity. If that were so, would it be contended that more than two days a week was at all necessary for inculcating those particular doctrines of the Church of England which were not inculcated in Cowper-Temple teaching? He thought the proposition was almost absurd. When they thought of little children, how much could they teach them of special doctrines wherein the Church of England differed from the bulk of Nonconformists? Up to the age of ten he thought they ought to be content with teaching the child those fundamental doctrines which practically included his own parent's specific religious faith. The compromise embodied in the Bill contained those great principles which he believed were firmly held by the great majority of the people of this country. In the first place, there was a common root of Christianity which they might safely teach to all children; and the second principle, held by most Christians in this country, i.e., that it was impossible that they should train up the population as Christians to do the best Christian work of which they were capable unless they taught the youth of the country, before they attained the age of thirteen or fourteen, that their duty was to belong to one of the great Christian communities. He believed that religious education would be incomplete unless it taught children when they came to be of full age that they should belong to one of the great Christian bodies in this country, and he believed that they would be infinitely better Christians, more forcible in fighting against the evil things of this world, if they began by teaching them that there was one great common Christian brotherhood of which the denominations were merely regiments in a fighting army.

Mr. GEORGE ROBERTS (Norwich) said he admired the sentiment expressed by the last speaker, that they should train children to the recognition of the great Christian brotherhood, but he confessed when he heard from the speeches how much they were afraid that the balance of advantage might be turned to the Church side or to the side of the Nonconformist, that the spirit of brotherhood was hardly contemplated in a practical way in Parliament. He wished to point out to the Government what in his opinion were the dangers which beset them along the line on which they were going. He found that those whom he regarded as well qualified to speak for the Church of England, as the Archbishop of Canterbury claimed to do, would not be satisfied with the provisions of this clause. Two days a week would not satisfy them for all time, and undoubtedly at succeeding elections, and in Parliament, demands would be made for the amendment of this Bill, so as to allow of tests and the right of entry into provided schools without any restriction whatever. He believed with the hon. Member for Nottingham that they should restrict this right as far as possible. In his view, two mornings a week, or three-quarters of an hour's definite dogmatic teaching, was quite as much as an ordinary child could assimilate. He agreed that they should seek not to extend the opportunities for this right of entry, but to hedge them round with reasonable restrictions as far as possible. He conceived that this was going to be a real danger to our educational system. After all, in the provided schools they had largely imbued the children with a recognition of the spirit of social unity. In his view, the right of entry would dissipate that altogether. The children in future would be divided into little sects, and undoubtedly that spirit of social unity would suffer proportionately. Further, he was inclined to think that the discipline of the school must be affected. He tried to picture to himself what would follow if this Bill became an Act of Parliament. Each morning the children would gather together, and would be divided into different sects. This meant that the school discipline would be upset completely every morning in the week. The head teacher was to look on passively and not interfere at all with what was being done by those who came in from outside. Moreover, different views might be held by the different teachers who imparted religious instruction. And the question was asked whether there was to be any supervision. For his own part he failed to see how supervision could be exercised, because it would need an army of inspectors, nearly one inspector to every teacher. He was convinced that the parents were not requiring that there should be the right of entry into council schools. It might be that the compromise had been entered into by persons who had no responsibility whatever, because they were repudiated in that House, but even if the terms of compromise did bring about peace inside the House of Commons, he was certain that it was going to create chaos and disorder in every one of the public schools. He believed that the parents did not desire it. But he could quite see that the different sects would immediately set to work. The parents' belief would be inquired into, and there would be some sort of religious inquisition instituted in the land. The parents would be marked off—as some of them were now politically—according to their religious opinions. He entered a strong protest against this right of entry at all, but certainly if they were unable to prevent its being enacted, he sincerely trusted that the Government would not give any further extension to the principle

*MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) thought there was a fallacy underlying the arguments of hon. Members on the other side, namely, that Cowper-Templeism as a foundation and a top-dressing of Church of England teaching would satisfy the vast majority of Church people as the religious education which ought to be given to their children. That, he thought, was also the underlying consideration which had induced the Government to refuse this very reasonable Amendment. He would ask hon. Members opposite to endeavour to meet the Church a little more than they were trying to do. It might seem unreasonable that all Church people did not accept Cowper-Temple teaching as a complete substratum, but in a great many places of Lancashire and elsewhere they desired their own teachers to teach Church principles in their own way. That might appear unreasonable, but why would they not allow them to have it? So far as the provided schools were concerned, he could understand perfectly well the position of hon. Members opposite. But he asked them to consider for a moment the position of the Church of England, in those schools which were in single-school areas. They had schools built with the subscriptions of poor men for the express purpose that their children should have a Church of England atmosphere and Church of England teaching on five days a week. What were they going to do under this Bill in single school areas? They were taking away these schools from the Church of England, and they were going to say to the majority of the parents—because they must be the majority for they had built the schools—that they were only to be allowed, at their own expense, two mornings a week when their children might be taught their religious faith, while the minority of parents who were satisfied with Cowper-Temple teaching were to have five mornings a week with nothing to pay. Then take the Roman Catholic schools, of which there were some twenty-five in England in single school-areas. Consider the position of the children in these Catholic schools in those single-school areas. No one would say that simple Cowper-Temple teaching would satisfy Catholic parents, and yet if they were not given an entry on five days a week, but only on two, they were saying to those Catholics who had built the schools: “Your children are going to have no religious instruction at all, or they are going to have Cowper-Temple teaching on three days a week, and only on two days a week are the priest and the nun to be allowed to come in and teach them.” That was a very great injustice. If the Government could see their way to make a compromise, to restrict the right of entry to two days a week in the old provided schools, and extend it to five in the Church and Catholic schools, they would do no harm to their own cause, and would certainly remove the very sore and angry feeling in Lancashire at the way in which the Catholic and Church schools were being filched from them.

*MR. ADKINS (Lancashire, Middleton): expressed regret that the development of the debate had not seemed to bring about a greater identity of opinion, but he hoped hon. Members opposite, who attached great importance to the right of entry, would consider that some of them who were perfectly loyal to this part of the Bill, much as they disliked it, saw very grave practical objections to the alteration proposed by the hon. Member for Totnes. He did not think anyone had denied that as a matter of actual fact, throughout the country denominational teaching was only given at the most on two days in the week, and very often only on one, in Church schools. When they found in a syllabus issued by a Diocesan Education Society that provision was made for this kind of instruction on only one morning in the week, and never on more than two, it was clear that the Bill as it stood was honestly trying to carry out what already existed by the wish and authority of the Church leaders in their own schools. Accordingly the onus of proof was very heavy on the hon. Member and his friends if they sought under this Bill to get more than was their unfettered practice at present in their own schools. That was admitted by the hon. Member for Oxford University, who had accused some members on that side of frivolity, because their conscience was affected by the difference between two and three days. It was not a question of conscience, but of practicability and fairness. He thought the hon. Gentleman himself had indulged in quite unwonted levity in a matter of this importance, when he knew that the ordinary practice was in accord with what the Government proposed, and yet said he would vote for the Amendment because of a casual remark of an hon. Member, who had been elaborately though unintentionally misinterpreted. That was deciding the question on a very minute detail. Any teacher known to be so teaching religion under the Cowper-Temple clause as to be really launching polemics against denominational instruction, would have very short shrift from any local education authority in the country. The real guarantee for what they all desired, that Cowper-Temple teaching should be used in no aggressive spirit, did not consist in the method proposed by the hon. Gentleman of eating into the Cowper-Temple teaching by this enlarged facility, but in a sense of fairness which local education authorities would have, and also in the great disinclination of local education authorities to have more religious controversy and discord than they could possibly avoid. There was no real danger to be run in that particular. Hon. Gentlemen put it with great seriousness that if they allowed the clergy or other persons to teach denominational instruction twice a week, and that could only be done by allowing them to come in every day, there was no difference in actual practical administration. There was an enormous difference if they were allowed to teach the same children every day. If there were thirty children desiring denominational instruction, there would have to be sixty lessons in the course of the week. If the Amendment were carried and denominational instruction was given five times a week, they would have to provide 150 lessons, which was a far greater disturbance of the ordinary methods of the school than where they were merely providing sixty. He was sure the ordinary administrator, who looked at this, not as a Churchman or a Dissenter, but as one who had to see that education was smoothly carried on, would see the enormous difference between two days a week and the three, four, or five days a week which would be possible under the Amendment. He was not opposing the Amendment with any wish to make these facilities anything but a reality, but while, on the one hand, one was anxious that these facilities should be adequate and real, he was also anxious that they should not be so arranged as to lead to the disorganisation of the schools.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) thought the Amendment reasonable and just, but said the debate would bring home to many men the extent of the concession which had been made. When they once allowed the right of entry they would be dragged in spite of themselves to allow it on equal terms to all denominations. That seemed to be the weak point in the position of those who supported the compromise, and what made it almost impossible, although it did not press upon the Catholics, was that they were for the first time establishing in the common schools of England an endowed, established, and compulsory form of religious instruction. It was no use trying to get away from it. He had only to quote the words of the Rev. Scott Lidgett, which would be heard again and again—

"Throughout the country in the course of this controversy let us always remember that in spite of this compromise Cowper-Templeism remains the established religion of the schools of England."

He believed that was an impossible position to maintain. He did not believe it would work out as a compromise to invite the Church of England to come into these schools in an inferior position only on two days a week. The question, what was Cowper-Templeism, and what could be done under it, had always had an extraordinary attraction for him, and he had never heard anyone really adequately explain the matter. It would, of course, be possible under it to carry on propaganda against the doctrines of the Church of England or Rome, and it was idle and absurd to repeat the cant phrase about Cowper-Templeism being simple Christianity free from dogma. Did simple Bible teaching include the New Testament and the sayings of Christ, and were they going to teach children the New Testament and not tell them who the chief figure of the New Testament was? If they did tell them who He was, was not that dogma, and would it not bring them into collision with Unitarians? He could never see his way through this maze of Cowper-Temple teaching at all. They could not teach the Bible or the New Testament without plunging into theology. They could teach no religion without theology or without dogma. In his opinion, under the Cowper-Temple clause, they could teach the Catholic religion. It depended on who drew up the syllabus. Catholics could draw up a syllabus without infringing the clause. Was it not rather childish to imagine that if they banished the Catechism they banished dogma out of the schools? There was nothing magical in the Catechism. They could teach under the Cowper-Temple system whatever the local authority chose to put into the syllabus, and the local authority, if they desired to counteract the influence of the High Church parson, could, and probably would, carry on something in the nature of a propaganda against his doctrine. They could not have the two things, and there was no use in attempting to get them; they could not have the schools free from the contentions of different religious denominations and at the same time allow the denominations into the schools. They were met the other day by a reference to schools in America and Australia, and warned that their fate might be similar to theirs. He had been in those schools in America and Australia, and there they had no conflict with the sects because they had a secular system. Once they established religious teaching in the schools they would open the flood-gates to all the dangers he had mentioned. He had dealt with the two points which induced him to intervene. It seemed to him that the Nonconformists had been led on to make a far greater sacrifice in this compromise than if they had accepted Clause 4 of the Act of 1906. That would have left the board schools intact under a system they approved of, but now they had invited the Church into their schools, and they would insist upon being put upon an equality with Cowper-Templeism. He supported the Amendment because he thought it was fair, and because hon. Members above the gangway supported the Catholics on a critical Amendment. This Amendment did nothing for Catholics, because their ideals ran in a totally different direction. They wanted a school where the whole atmosphere was Catholic. The noble Lord had so eloquently expressed their view on this matter that he was almost tempted to invite him to come over and join them. [OCCASIONAL cries of "Oh, oh!"] He did not mean anything offensive, but the noble Lord had eloquently expressed their view of this subject when he said that he attached supreme importance to impressing upon the mind of the children the fact that they belonged to a great ecclesiastical organisation, and that was the only way in which religion could be kept alive. The children should be taught that they were members of a great Church entrusted with the task of maintaining the Christian faith. Catholics had no interest in the right of entry, and he looked forward to the day when Nonconformists would deeply regret they did not meet them on this question in 1906.

MR. WALTERS said that poor, simple Nonconformists, who were persuaded to accept this compromise, imagined that as far as the council schools were concerned they would preserve their old freedom from religious interference, and that all they were asked to do was to give the opportunity on two mornings a week for denominational instruction to be given to the children of the parents who desired it above and beyond the ordinary Cowper-Temple instruction they were receiving on the other days in the week. They understood that all the children would assemble at the morning worship. They imagined that under the compromise it would still be possible for the children to look upon each other in a friendly way without being divided into sectarian pens, and that there would still be some common ground upon which the children would share the same kind of religious exercise. But nothing of that sort was to be continued. The children of denominationalists were not to be contaminated by singing hymns with Cowper-Temple children. They were to have on two mornings a week not Cowper-Temple instruction but some other kind of foundation on which the superstructure of the Anglican Church religion might be built. That was not what Nonconformists or the supporters of council schools expected. He had had practical experience of council schools for a great many years, and to grant the right of entry on two mornings a week with the inevitable division of the teachers into different sects, was an enormous sacrifice to make. A full denominational atmosphere for certain children in the schools was not the basis of a compromise to which Nonconformists could agree. It was not a compromise when one party swallowed the other. When the whale appropriated Jonah it was not a compromise—far from it. He was prepared for a reasonable compromise, but if Members opposite imagined this was to be the beginning of a kind of absorption of the whole educational system by denominations they did not understand the spirit and thought of the country. He had nothing to say to priests and parsons in their proper place, but he did not want them in the schools. He objected to them from every standpoint. They gave no help educationally or religiously. They stirred up strife and contention and nothing but mischief resulted. Hon. Members opposite argued that if they were going to give denominational teaching on two mornings a week it was quite simple to give it on five mornings. Supposing they had a school with only two classrooms, holding thirty scholars each, and they wanted two classrooms to accommodate the number of children who wanted special instruction on two mornings. If they increased the number to five times a week they would not have sufficient accommodation, and they could not be expected to expand their schools at the dictation of the denominations. In a large number of schools the classroom accommodation was a very serious difficulty. If they were going to give this special grant of denominational instruction on five mornings they would require a larger staff of teachers, and that practically meant compelling a large proportion of the teachers in the school to volunteer for special religious instruction. The whole object of this proposal was to create a denominational atmosphere and impose denominational instruction upon council schools. He was prepared to sacrifice a great many of his prejudices and a few of his principles for this compromise, but nothing would induce him to vote for a claim of this kind if it was to be extended in every direction. First they made a small concession, and then they were asked to give five times as much. As far as he was concerned, if the Government went on making concessions he should not support them. He had been lectured by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for saying that Cowper-Temple teaching could be given which was antagonistic to the doctrines of the Anglican Church, but this was perfectly true. Simple Bible instruction taught that salvation was through Jesus Christ, but many Anglicans held that salvation was through Apostolic succession and all the machinery of a State church. He hoped the Government would resist the Amendment and not allow itself to become the Jonah and the other side the whale.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN did not think the remarks of the last speaker had contributed towards a peaceful solution of this difficult question. The hon. Member, speaking as the chairman of an education committee, said that the Cowper-Temple clause was antagonistic and destructive of the beliefs of the children of the Church of England.

MR. WALTERS said the right hon. Gentleman was not quoting him correctly. He did not say so.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN believed he was correctly interpreting what the hon. Gentleman said. When the hon. Gentleman interrupted him it was to ask—why should not teachers who gave Cowper-Temple teaching give instruction which was destructive of the Christian faith? Such a question went far to justify the fear which he did not share but which was felt by many of his hon. friends, and if there was no other argument in favour of the Amendment now before the Committee the statement which the hon. Member had made as to the practice in schools with which he was acquainted was sufficient to justify them in pressing for the adoption of the Amendment.

MR. W. BENN (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said the question they were discussing was one of fact. His desire was that the right of entry should be a genuine concession and not an illusory one. The question of fact was: On how many days was it usual for special religious instruction to be given? When they had decided that question they would be able to say on how many days it should be made statutory by this Bill. Light had been thrown on that subject by the utterances of hon. Gentlemen opposite. He reminded the Committee that the First Lord of the Admiralty brought forward last year a statement which purported to show the proportion of the time worked by teachers which represented that occupied in giving special religious instruction. The statement called forth protests from some hon. Gentlemen who stated that the fraction was a great deal too big. The hon. Member for the Ecclesall Division of Sheffield stated—

“The general practice in the Church of England schools at the present time was that special religious teaching was only for one half-hour in the week.”

Various controversialists outside said that one-fifteenth was a ridiculous fraction to take. Canon Alford said—

“In most Church schools they found that the two Scripture knowledge lessons in the week were the only ones that could be called denominational, and the other three were as purely Scripture lessons as in any Council school. In some Church schools the time given to denominational teaching was even less.”

Canon Cleworth said—

“Moreover, the teaching of the Catechism and Prayer Book occupy only one-thirtieth of the weekly school hours, so that instead of one-fifteenth, one-nintieth is a more accurate estimate.”

Judging of the question in the light of those statements it seemed to him that two mornings a week were quite sufficient. He understood that there were three definite propositions. One was that denominational teaching should be given on only two days in the week in any given school; the second was that any child should have denominational teaching on only two days of the week; and the third was that any child should have denominational teaching every day of the week if necessary. That was what he understood the Amendment to mean. The Bill brought in by the Chief Secretary for Ireland was before the House laid down that denominational instruction in the transferred schools should be given only on two days of the week, and an Amendment was put down by an hon. Member on the other side of the House to make it clear that every child should be entitled to receive special religious instruction on two days of the week, although the teaching itself might have to take place on four days of the week. The Chief Secretary at that time admitted that the intention of the Government was that no child should be entitled to have the special religious instruction on more than two days a week.

MR. LAMBTON (Durham, S.E.), as one who voted for the Second Reading of the Bill, could not support the Amendment, because it was against the spirit of the compromise entered into. The position the Archbishop of Canterbury accepted in principle was that Cowper-Temple teaching was sufficient for Christian children. There were hon. Members who did not accept that view; for instance, the hon. Member for East Mayo declared that Cowper-Temple teaching was worse than nothing; but representatives of the Church of England did not take up that attitude. The compromise was founded on the idea that Cowper-Temple teaching on three mornings and denominational teaching on two mornings was sufficient Christian education for a child up to the age of fourteen. It was his view, after following the discussions upon earlier Education Bills, that it would not be impossible for all denominations to come together and settle upon some form of religious teaching sufficient for young children. Cowper-Temple teaching, if given honestly, as it had been and would be, by a teacher worthy of his position, was sufficient. A teacher must have the confidence of the children he taught; he must not deceive them. If he attempted that he would soon be found out, and it was easy to lose the confidence of children. If he gave instruction with—so to speak—his tongue in his cheek, he would lose the children's confidence and the whole tone of the school would deteriorate. There was no danger if the teaching were given in an honest manner. It was based on the Bible, and, after all, there must be some common form of belief in Christianity in these days, 2,000 years after Christ. He was reading not long since from a book written some 250 years ago by a celebrated divine, Thomas Hobbes, of Malmesbury, in which it was declared that the fundamental faith of Christianity was that Jesus was the Christ, and surely that was taught under the Cowper-Temple clause?

LORD R. CECIL: It may not be.

MR. LAMBTON: Surely his noble friend would not say that it did not teach Christianity? If it did not, they had better give up the Bill at once and have secular teaching. His noble friend must have some faith in the Christianity of his fellows. As the same old writer to whom he referred said, if assent were required to all the doctrines taught by theologians nothing in the world would be so hard as to be a Christian. Why put difficulties in the way of children? What would a child of fourteen understand of this discussion? Suppose the empty Gallery of the House were filled with listening children, what would they understand of this discussion? They would hear Members apparently abusing each other and telling each other across the floor of the House that they were not true Christians, and what would the children think of that? He believed the compromise was an honest compromise, and he could not support the Amendment.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (MR. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury) said he was quite sure the Committee would appreciate the speech just delivered as a sensible contribution to the debate. Everybody admitted that the old Cowper-Temple clause was a vague clause, and that no clause could accurately define the kind of education given for the last thirty-eight years. It could not be defined, but they could act on the experience of it. All the school authorities had acted with due regard for the sacredness of the teaching given under the clause, and when the noble Lord insisted that religious teaching to be efficient must be denominational he asked, Was this not so abroad? He reminded the noble Lord of the China mission and the report of the undenominational character of the organisation and teaching of that mission to which Lord William Cecil attached his signature. All that was now asked was that there should not be artificially created differences of Christian teaching, just as they were not to be created in China. Of course, they might continue to bandy tu quoques over the Cowper-Temple clause, but sensible men would be content to lean on the experience they had had. The hon. Member for Brightside said he had known teaching given antagonistic to Church doctrines, but he could only say, after seeing a good deal of school administration, that he had never heard of anything of the kind. That, he believed, had been the general experience of administrators. As a matter of fact, the Amendment before the Committee was founded on the proposition that the Cowper-Temple clause was not sufficient for Church school-children and that they required Church teaching on the five days of the week when two had been sufficient in the past. They had done their best to meet hon. Gentlemen opposite. The Government had gone a long way to meet them. They had done their best to be generous in granting fair facilities for religious instruction. They had done what they could to make the concessions which they had granted real concessions. They had done what they could to make them good, not only in the mere machinery, but in giving the children the religious instruction which their parents desired.

LORD R. CECIL said he would not detain the Committee more than a few minutes. He wished first of all respectfully to recognise, if he might, the admirable tone which had characterised the speeches of the Minister for Education. He rose mainly to reply in a word or two to the speech of the hon. Member for South-East Durham. The Minister for Education quoted a statement of what was done at some meeting in China, with reference to a concordat which had been entered into by the missionaries. With every word of that declaration he was in hearty and complete agreement. He did not himself doubt that there was an essential agreement between all the sects who held the Christian faith, including the Roman Catholics, with regard to the fundamental doctrines of that faith. And he fully agreed with the hon. Member for South-East Durham that the points on which all the sects were at one were out of all proportion to those on which they differed. He had never said anything in this House which would conflict with that opinion, and if anyone imagined that he had done so he would be delighted to withdraw it and do penance in a white sheet. But he wished to say that to attempt to teach, particularly to the young, Christianity on an undenominational basis was, in his judgment, wrong and doomed to failure. It was all very true to say that they were agreed as to the great doctrines of the Christian faith and that they should recognise what the different sects had done in the way of the conversion of the heathen; but he did not want anything to be done by the State to compel anyone to adopt the teaching of the Anglican or the Wesleyan or any other religious body. What he wanted was to give an opportunity to the parents to have their children taught the faith which they themselves held. If they tied the hands of all the sects and said that they were not to teach the children in such a way as to attach them to the denomination to which the parents belonged, then the State would be putting fetters on the hands of the teachers which would make it impossible for them to do the work which they were set to do. His hon. friend had said very truly that it was part of the spirit of Cowper-Templeism not only that they were not to seek to attach children to this or that particular religious body, but not to detach them from the religious denomination to which the parents belonged. Although he deplored the tone of the hon. Member for the Brightside division, he entirely agreed with the substance of his speech, and he could not see how anyone could disagree with it. It was that there was nothing in the Cowper-Temple clause to prevent teaching being given which was hostile to Christianity, and the hon. Gentleman had given an admirable instance of it. His hon. friend had said with great indignation that it was absurd to suppose that under the Cowper-Temple clause any teacher could teach what was against Christianity; but his hon. friend was up in the clouds in regard to this matter, for it had been proved over and over again that under Cowper-Templeism there was teaching which might be moral but was not Christianity. There was no doubt whatever that that had been done. For himself, he held that the case put forward by the hon. Member who moved the Amendment was irresistible, viz., that it was desirable, if the parents wished it, that they should have an opportunity of their children being taught their own religion not only two but five days in the week if they were satisfied that Cowper-Temple teaching was not in accordance with their religion but was hostile to it. He objected to this labelling of denominational teaching with the badge of inferiority. The proposal in the Bill was one more step towards the discouragement of denominational teaching, which he believed was the only really effective way of teaching Christianity. For that reason he would support the Amendment.

*MR. VERNEY (Buckinghamshire, N.) said that he knew many schools in which Cowper-Temple teaching had been given for years, and in these schools there were children whose parents belonged to different denominations but who raised no objection whatever to that teaching. Some months ago he was in a school in Scotland where children belonging to every denomination, sitting on the same benches, were being given religious instruction by the same teacher who had been master of the school for twenty-eight years. He asked that teacher whether he had had any difficulty in regard to this religious teaching, and the teacher assured him that he had never during all those years had a single complaint made by any parent of a child attending the school, although the children belonged to every denomination in Scotland. He maintained that in the face of facts like these the Minister for Education had a right to appeal to experience that there was no difficulty in teaching the fundamental principles of Christianity to classes of mixed denominational children. The Cowper-Temple clause was in no sense a form of religious belief, but merely a prohibition against the use of certain dogmatic forms. No one could say that the Sermon on the Mount was either denominational or indefinite. It must then be conceded that there was such a thing as definite religious instruction which was not denominational but which had had a beneficial result on the character of the children, a result which remained with them all their lives.

MR. WALTER GUINNESS (Bury St. Edmunds) said that as he read the Amendment it would make the position of the Church of England not better but worse, because it would put it entirely within the power of the local education authority to say on which days religious instruction was to be given. He believed that this compromise had been entered into in a perfectly honest spirit, but if the hon. Gentleman's interpretation was right, very great confusion would be caused, because they had been told that the local education authorities would try to prevent the Bill being worked in the spirit of give and take, and that they might say that it would be inconvenient for them to give more than one day to special denominational religious instruction. Thus endless difficulties would be caused and an appeal to the Board of Education as to whether there should be religious instruction on two or five days would be useless. If they wanted to avoid trouble they should define the obligation of the local authority to give religious instruction, but as the clause now stood a loophole would be left to the local education authority to evade the obligation.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
 Mildmay and Mr. Lane-Fox.

SIR BERKELEY SHEFFIELD (Lincolnshire, Brigg) asked whether his proposal to insert after the first word "on" the word "any" would not make the intention of the Government clearer than it seemed to be at present. He took it that two mornings of the week might only mean Monday and Tuesday, whereas if the word "any" were added it would make the matter plainer. He put the Amendment forward in order to see if the Government thought right to accept it, but he should not carry the matter to a division, because they had stated that every teacher of a denomination would have facilities to enter any school on any day of the week. He only wished to put in the word "any" to make it certain that the teachers would be able to enter the school on any day of the week if they did not teach an individual child more than twice. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 26, after the first word 'on,' to insert the word 'any.'"—(Sir Berkeley Sheffield.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'any' be there inserted."

SIR W. ROBSON was understood to say that he thought the insertion of this word would go a good deal further than the hon. Baronet himself intended according to the explanation he had given. It would give the parent the right to claim instruction on any morning without reference to the particular two selected by the local authority. In other words it would give the control of the arrangements for this kind of instruction to the parent instead of to the authority, and that would give rise to great inconvenience. It was for the authority to settle how many mornings they might think it convenient to give the instruction, and they might say three mornings or four mornings, and the hon. Baronet's Amendment would be an interference with their discretion which he did not think would facilitate the working of the clause.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley) inquired whether the clause would not allow the authority to say that they did not intend the instruction to go on on Tuesday, and in defiance of the parent they might say that they would not allow denominational instruction on certain days.

SIR W. ROBSON said the authority could name the days, but it must arrange at least two mornings. If it could arrange for every such child getting two mornings by giving less than four or five days a week, they would do it. If one of the two days did clash with the convenience of the parent it would be a misfortune but he did not think they could meet it.

MR. FORSTER (Kent, Sevenoaks) inquired whether the local authority would not be bound by subsection (6) which provided that they should have regard to the number of children or different groups of children for whom religious instruction provided by the authority and religious instruction under this section were from time to time respectively desired, to the proportion of the number of those children in each case to the total number of children in attendance at the school, to the number of persons available to give the different forms of teaching, and to the manner in which the class-rooms might be used most conveniently by those several teachers. They therefore could not make the instruction any particular mornings in the week provided there was a sufficient number of children desiring this form of instruction to make it necessary for them to appoint denominational teaching on every day.

SIR W. ROBSON said that subsection (6) made it perfectly clear. It said the authority were to take into account the circumstances, and secure for each child instruction on two mornings a week in their institution. In order to fulfil that obligation they must allow the teachers to come in every day if necessary, but if they could fulfil that obligation by allowing them to come in four days a week they would be at liberty to do so.

MR. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University) said that this was a matter of importance. As he understood the Attorney-General, if the local authority desired they could roughly estimate that denominational teaching would require only a certain number of teachers. They might say to the teachers they gave them two days a week on which they could have four different class-rooms of a respectable size, but there might not be four teachers on that particular morning. In that way the local authority might have full power to stop the denominational teaching from going on properly. His right hon. friend would notice that subsection (6) did not require the local education authority to take into account the number of teachers.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: Oh, yes; it says that the local education authority shall have regard "to the number of persons available."

MR. RAWLINSON: If that be so, I have nothing more to say.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. YOXALL, in moving to insert the word "appointed," said the object of his Amendment was to secure that two days only should be appointed for this purpose as a result of the endeavour of the local education authority to meet the wishes of the parents. He did not want class "A" to be taken on Mondays and Wednesdays and class "B" on Tuesdays and Thursdays. He wanted, if possible, to narrow these five days to any given children to two days of the week—to allow only two days a week. That was what he believed the Government wanted, and that was what he asked them to do. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 26, after the word 'two' to insert the word 'appointed.'"—(Mr. Yoxall.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'appointed' be there inserted."

SIR W. ROBSON assured the hon. Gentleman that the Government would be only too happy to accept any Amendment of his to safeguard this matter, but they thought that this Amendment would too greatly limit the authority. The local education authority would have a very difficult task in cases where a great many denominations put forward a claim for this right of entry. He thought this matter ought to be left entirely to the local education authority.

Amendment negatived.

LORD R. CECIL, on behalf of the hon. Member for Norwood moved to substitute the word "each" for the first word "the" so that the clause should read "for the purpose of enabling that child to receive that instruction on two mornings in each week on which the school meets." It had occurred to his hon. friend whether the section as drafted would carry out the intentions of the Government whether it would not confine this to two mornings in the week on which the school met.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 26, to leave out the first word 'the' and insert the word 'each.'"—(Lord R. Cecil.)

Question proposed "That the word 'each' be there inserted."

SIR W. ROBSON did not think that could be so.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ESSEX (Gloucestershire, Cirencester) said the Amendment he desired to move was a small one, but he ventured to think not unimportant. Its object was that when parents demanded this privilege they should be assured that it would be given to them for twelve months.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 27, after the word 'meets,' to insert the words 'for twelve calendar months thereafter.'"—(Mr. Essex.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. ROBSON thought it would be most undesirable to put a limit on these arrangements.

Amendment negatived.

*MR. ASHLEY moved an Amendment the object of which, he said, was to make it obligatory on the local authorities to make suitable accommodation for denominational teaching either in or adjoining the schoolhouse. He saw no reason why the local education authority should not give equal facilities to denominational education as to undenominational. If the right of entry was to be real the local education authorities must, even at some expense, give the children, of those parents who desired to avail themselves of the right of entry, this accommodation, and that could only be done by providing room for these denominational classes. The local education authorities were compelled to give secular instruction to every child, and Cowper-Temple teaching to every child between 9 and 9.45 a.m., if the child's parent demanded it. If it was obligatory on the local education authority to give Cowper-Temple teaching then it was not fair that they should be able to say that the denominational teaching could not be given unless there was some accommodation available for the purpose. If that were allowed Cowper-Temple teaching would be given the preference. He could not see why in most cases, even if there was no room in the schoolhouse, the local education authority should not hire a room in the neighbourhood; otherwise denominational teaching would be placed in an inferior position to Cowper-Temple teaching. If this was to be a compromise, the Bill must not be allowed to leave the House with that sense of inferiority on the part of the Church of England and the Roman Catholic Church. Whatever arrangements were made by high ecclesiastical authorities had been made without any consultation with those who sat on the Opposition benches, and they were not bound by what had been agreed to by the bishops and archbishops. Unless undenominationalism and denominationalism were placed on an equality there could not be a settlement. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 27, to leave out from the word 'meets,' to the end of the subsection, and insert the words 'provide suitable accommodation in or adjoining the schoolhouse.'"—(Mr. Ashley.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'make' stand part of the clause."

SIR W. ROBSON said he did not propose to follow the hon. Gentleman through the whole of his remarks. The hon. Member said that in regard to the terms of compromise, hon. Gentlemen opposite had not been consulted and were free in regard to them. If the negotiations were referred to at all it was rather for the purpose of indicating that they might in a certain degree limit the Government's freedom of action and not in any way limit the freedom of action of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The Amendment raised three rather important and substantial points. The first was that it made it compulsory on the local authority to provide accommodation, without any qualification at all. In the next place it proposed to enact that the accommodation should be suitable. In the third place, the accommodation was to be in or adjoining the school. In regard to the first point, the Bill as it stood only put upon the local authority the obligation of providing such accommodation as was available. The Government had accepted suggestions which would make that provision possibly clearer, though he thought it was reasonably clear already. An Amendment by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Worcestershire had been put down in the name of the Government so that it might not be subject to accidental exclusion, and under that Amendment the local authority would have to provide suitable accommodation in the schoolhouse where it was reasonably available, unless they satisfied the Board of Education that accommodation could not be made available without making structural alterations or additions. He thought when they came to deal with the Amendment in its turn it would be seen that it was a substantial advance, and was at all events worth considering. The next point was as to the suitability of the accommodation. That also was provided for in the proposals which they had upon the Paper. The third question was as to accommodation adjoining the school house. He did not think that the hon. Member had sufficiently reflected upon that point, because if the local authority was animated by the intentions which the hon. Gentleman ascribed to it, then to press this demand might have the effect of causing the local authority to send denominational teaching out of the school altogether. But even friendly authorities might be put under serious difficulty if the Amendment were adopted, because what the hon. Gentleman intended was, if there were no available accommodation in the school-house, that accommodation should be provided for them near the school. Let the Committee see what that involved in the case of a friendly authority. The hon. Member was seeking to put a heavy building obligation in many cases on the schools which belonged to the community at large, in order that the gratuitous use of those buildings thus erected might be at the disposal of the denominations. He thought that was pushing the right of entry much further than even hon. Gentlemen opposite should require. It was something more than a right of entry—it was a right to have buildings erected at the cost of the community for the express and particular use of certain denominations. He thought that the hon. Gentleman would see that he was going far beyond anything that the Government should feel disposed or entitled to give.

SIR E. CARSON (Dublin University) thought that his hon. and learned friend would admit that this matter of the right of entry, in connection with which they were endeavouring to frame safeguards, was from their point of view one of the most important provisions in the Bill. It was about all the denominations were getting in this part of the Bill, unless they were willing to contract out of the national system of education. The apprehension seemed to be that the right of entry might not be a reality in some places. It should be remembered that it was their own voluntary schools which were going to be handed over to the local authorities, so that even their own schools built for the purposes of denominational education might be subject to the answer of the local authority that they had no room for denominational teaching. That was a very serious matter, and one which they could not let go without having given a good deal of consideration to it to see whether or not they were sufficiently safeguarded. There were many ways in which the right of entry might be safeguarded, but in the Bill there were no safeguards at all. In the first place, it was a very easy thing for a hostile local education authority—and they were already beginning to be a little frightened by the amount of literature they were receiving as to the way in which local authorities would work this compromise if the Bill were passed—to say that it had no accommodation available. It might be put forward, in a perfectly bona fide way, that there was no available accommodation; but what was to happen then? They took over the Church's denominational schools, and then the Church was to be told that there was to be no more denominational teaching in those schools. They would be incurring the risk, particularly in growing districts, when their schools were transferred, of having no available accommodation at all for denominational teaching. He thought that was a great blot on the Bill. It made one extremely suspicious as regarded the probability of the Bill's working, in some respects, as it was no doubt intended by the Government that it should work. The second point of his hon. friend was as to the Board of Education, in which denominationalists had not any very great confidence. He dared say that when the Unionists were in power there were Nonconformists who had not any great confidence in the Board of Education of that day. That was his point. What was the tribunal to whom they were going to refer these important points? It was a tribunal in which neither side at various times would have any confidence. That was extremely unsatisfactory, and there ought to be some means, if the local education authority raised these points, by which the parties would be satisfied that they would have their matters decided by a tribunal in which they had confidence. Therefore, if they placed the two points together, namely, that they were leaving the loophole, and in leaving the loophole, they were not setting up a tribunal in which the parties would have confidence, then they were very greatly minimising the satisfaction which they might otherwise feel with this provision of the Bill. He knew that there had been something said about accepting the Amendment of his right hon. friend, but it would still leave it open to the local education authority to say that they had no available accommodation, and that might occur in many cases. He would appeal to the Government not to leave this matter open to a hostile education authority, but close it up in the Bill, and make it say that in all these cases the right of entry should be a reality, and that no power to create obstacles to the exercise of it should be given to the local education authority.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs) said that for his part he would not for worlds do anything unjust or ungenerous to any church, least of all to the Church, or to the mother Church of Rome, or to the daughter Churches known as Free. But he thought that there was a serious flaw in the argument of his hon. friend the Member for Blackpool, and in the argument of the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, which invalidated both their speeches. They said that the right of entry was not fair, because preference was given to Cowper-Templeism over what was called denominationalism. But there was a fallacy in that. Cowper-Templeism was not a religion. That was the whole point. If he was right, then other churches, if Cowper-Templeism could not be called a church, were on the same footing. Cowper-Templeism was the sublimated essence of Christianity, a sort of State code of morals to which nobody could take any exception, and upon which the creed of any church might safely be grafted. He should say any creed but that of the Catholics, which practically was lost if the Catholic atmosphere was not preserved intact in youth and adolescence. Last night, the Deputy-Chairman had stopped him when he endeavoured to deal with this subject, but now that the Chairman was present, if he had two minutes, he could explain exactly the line that really existed between Cowper-Templeism and denominationalism. He would, however, have to trespass on the preserves of the hon. Member for Newbury, and go as far as China. At least he believed the hon. Member was Captain-General of the Chinoleptics, if indeed the corps had not been disbanded.

THE CHAIRMAN: I really do not think we can re-discuss this question on every Amendment.

*MR. REES said in that case he would say nothing about it. He would end where he began. He protested that the fallacy which was exhibited in the speeches of the hon. Member for Blackpool and of the noble Lord was that this endeavour to describe Cowper-Templeism as a religion, which no one could properly describe it as being, entirely falsified the whole of the argument. If it was true that it was a mere sublimated essence of Christianity, a mere code of morals, bearing the same relation in England to the Christian Churches as the code of Confucius bore in China to ancestor worship and Buddhism, where was the inequality and the injustice to other denominations? Upon such teaching might surely be grafted the teaching of the Church of England or of the Free Churches.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley) said the Amendment raised a question of policy of sufficient importance to make one regret that they should not have any Member of the Cabinet present. The Attorney-General said they could not have this Amendment, because it made it compulsory to provide accommodation for Church teaching. To him that was not an objection. They had to provide accommodation for Cowper-Temple teaching under the Bill. In the surrendered Church school why should it not be obligatory on the local authority to provide accommodation and facilities for that particular form of religion which had been given in that school for years? He wanted to raise a specific point dealing with a very disquieting answer given by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Education yesterday. The hon. Member for Sowerby Bridge stated the other day in a letter to the newspapers that 1,000 schools in single-school parishes were schools of one room only, and in them there was to be no right of entry and no giving of denominational instruction. That was one-fifth of their schools gone. He wondered who told the hon. Member that. The hon. Member for Yarmouth asked a question on that point, and the Parliamentary Secretary refused to give any specific denial of the allegation that in the opinion of the Board of Education administrative reasons might be considered adequate to say that in a single-room school this teaching should not be given. That was a very serious state of things. There were 1,000 schools, and 980 of them probably were Church of England schools. A single-room school need not be a bad or an old building. He knew cases where people had put their hands in their pockets in recent years and paid a good deal of money to provide a school which was adequate for the population of the district but had only one room. It was evidently contemplated that in certain conditions the fact of its being a single-room school would be sufficient to exclude denominational teaching on the ground that the general conduct and discipline of the school and general administrative convenience would make it impossible. He wanted to exact a statement on that point across the floor of the House. He desired to know on what grounds it was fair to take away from the Church of England these 1,000 schools if in future the fact of their smallness would prevent them giving any more denominational instruction. It was a great and probably an admitted hardship. He did not know that it was originally contemplated, but here was a statement of a very well-informed Member, who represented a district which in the past had not been slow to take advantage of the opportunities of injuring voluntary schools, that was largely supported by the Board of Education.

*THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. TREVELYAN, Yorkshire, W.R., Elland) said he was, of course, not responsible for what was said by the hon. Member for Sowerby Bridge, and he hardly thought the report that the noble Lord had given was exactly correct of what he had said on behalf of the Board. What he had said was that in the case of single-room schools there would be a right of entry unless reasons of administrative convenience prevented it. The whole idea of the clause was that the right of entry should be as absolute as it could possibly be consistently with certain administrative difficulties which might arise, as they thought in very few of the schools, and possibly those few schools would be more single-room schools than any other.

SIR E. CARSON: How many single-room schools are there?

*MR. TREVELYAN said it was not exactly known. He went on to say in the answer it was not possible to lay down a hard-and-fast rule applicable to all single-room schools. Large numbers of them were already provided with partition screens and other means of separating them, which meant that administratively the right of entry would be easily practicable, or were otherwise suitable for the conduct of two or more classes. He had in his mind a quite small school in his own county, a comparatively small room where there were very often two classes taken at the same time. There was nothing administratively impossible in it, but there might be a few instances in which it would be impossible to have a right of entry, but he thought they would be very few. He thought hon. Members were acting really too much from a suspicious view of what the local authorities wanted to do. He took the very case with which they were always challenging them, the West Riding of Yorkshire, in which he represented a very Nonconformist constituency. It was perfectly true that the West Riding from 1902 onwards, through the county council, did in many respects work the Act of 1902 as far as it possibly could in the interest of what it regarded as the right settlement, that all schools should, as far as possible, be under the control of the local education authority, and they were admittedly not friendly to non-provided schools which were under their control. Everyone knew and admitted that. But in 1902 what was the condition of public county in which thousands amount of Nonconformists were violently discontented with the Bill, all necessarily appro- resister or of the strong measures which by the county council, but they were to a man discontented. What was the state of things now in his constituency—one of the most Nonconformist in the West Riding? He had been reading in the papers with regard to the various people who lived in his constituency, leaders of opinion, on this Bill. In one part of the constituency, one of the leading Nonconformist ministers, strongly opposed to the Bill of 1902, was strongly in favour of the compromise, although of course he did not approve, as none of them did, of all the conditions of the Bill. The man who led the passive resistance movement accepted the Bill, and finally a man who was a passive resister and who went on to the county council because he was a passive resister also accepted the Bill, and expressed his intention of working it. The very people who were most anxious, as far as possible, to work the Act of 1902 in the interests of what they thought the public, as against the Church and the non-provided schools, were the men who at this moment were most ready to accept the Bill. He had no reason to suppose there were not a very large number of Nonconformists throughout the West Riding who wished to do the same, and if that state of things existed it was quite impossible to suppose that the county council of the West Riding would be allowed, even though there were a certain number of people who wished to make mischief upon it, to make the Bill a dead letter, and he believed that not only the county councils and the corporations which had hitherto taken a strong line, but even those local education authorities which, like the West Riding, had taken a rather questionable line from the hon. Member's point of view, were honestly intending to work the Bill. If he was right in thinking that, he felt that the anticipation of danger of hon. Gentlemen opposite were very much over-coloured. In the case of the single-room schools it was extremely likely, even if they had not on the top of the local education authority the control of the Education Board, that the Act would be honestly worked at the service of the Church of England. Finally, they accepted the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Worcestershire because it gave in the most direct form possible an appeal to the Board of Education. In starting this new system he ventured to say that if they could get the local authorities, or most of them, in a reasonable frame of mind and ready to start, and if they could be sure of the system starting well, it was one which would be readily accepted and adhered to by the mass of the people of this country for many years to come. Some hon. Gentlemen opposite had expressed suspicion of the Board of Education. They had said that perhaps not the present Board, but another Board might be unwilling to work this Bill honestly. Even right hon. Gentlemen opposite could not think that of the present Board, because they could not suppose that the President of the Board of Education, if he got this Bill through, was not going to get this measure worked honestly. It was as much as his political reputation was worth if he did not carry out the measure honestly. In the next place they had the undoubted anxiety of the mass of the people through local authorities to work the measure honestly, and they had on the top of that, if they accepted the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Worcestershire, the Education Department at present controlled by a man who was determined to make his Bill work and to see that the local authorities did their duty in regard to it.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said he found himself differing from those of his hon. friends who had spoken in the course of this discussion. The hon. Member opposite had alluded to the distrust of the Board of Education as an ultimate and sole court of appeal. He agreed with the hon. Member who had just sat down that the President of the Board of Education, and any President they were likely to see in that office for some time to come, would do his best if this Bill were passed to make it work fairly. As far as the Amendment went it did not carry this matter any further.

MR. ASHLEY said he dealt with the matter further in a subsequent Amendment.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said that if they had a court of appeal it would apply to the whole working of the section. As regarded the Amendment before them, what was the difference between that and the one which the Government had accepted which stood in his name and which was framed by himself in consultation with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hanover Square and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University? The Amendment which the Government had accepted placed a specific obligation on the local authority to make available any existing suitable accommodation, or to satisfy the Board of Education that it could not be made available, before the right of entry was refused. His hon. friend wished to say that where suitable accommodation was not available, and where it could not be provided, there the local education authority should be obliged to provide additional buildings by spending money. That was a demand which it was not possible for him to support. He had taken the main lines of the compromise as they were sketched in the Bill, and as they appeared in the correspondence between the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Prime Minister, and he could not help feeling that what was proposed would be going outside those main lines. He should, therefore, remain contented with the concession the Government had made and he could not support the Amendment. The cases which his hon. friend had in mind were much fewer than the figures cited would lead the Committee to suppose. It did not follow because a school was a single room that accommodation would not be available. There were, as the Parliamentary Secretary had stated, cases where partitions might be put up, which were not structural alterations, in order to make the room available for that kind of instruction. He attached some importance to the fact that the provision included not only the schoolroom, but the master's house which was attached. In a case where there happened to be twenty-one scholars belonging to one denomination and ten belonging to another, it would be possible to allow the twenty-one to remain in the schoolroom and withdraw the other ten into the parlour of the master's house. He wished to point out that in many of these schools the minority would be the undenominational portion of the school. He thought the number of instances where they would not be able to provide the necessary accommodation would be very small indeed.

*SIR GEORGE WHITE (Norwich) said the picture which the right hon. Gentleman had drawn in regard to religious instruction being given in the teacher's house was likely to set the teacher's organisation more against the Bill than ever. He was sorry he could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman in that respect. Without any actual authority as to figures he doubted from his own knowledge of the rural districts whether there were anything like 1,000 single-room schools in the Kingdom. He had a strong suspicion that the hon. Member for Sowerby Bridge had in his mind single-teacher schools rather than single-room schools. At the same time he quite shared what the right hon. Gentleman said as to the possibility of making even single-room schools available for this special teaching without having recourse to the teacher's house which he should certainly not regard as a remedy for the difficulty. He had risen to try and allay some of the suspicions which appeared to actuate hon. Members opposite in regard to the conduct of local authorities. He invited hon. Members to survey the constitution of local authorities and especially county authorities. If there was any ground for such a suspicion it ought to exist in the minds of Non-conformists rather than in the minds of hon. Members opposite, for certainly in the case of county local authorities where they would have control of the vast number of transferred schools the party opposite were in a majority from a political point of view. He felt that whatever political party might be in a majority they would endeavour to administer the Bill fairly and reasonably towards all parties. He deprecated that feeling of suspicion which was almost worthy of a gentleman trying to buy a horse from another person rather than dealing with the religious difficulty. As to whether there would be accommodation available he had listened to the remarks of many hon. Members on the point and they appeared to have drawn a picture of six, eight, or ten different religious sections endeavouring to find accommodation in one schoolroom. Speaking for himself, he held the conviction that the Free Churches as a whole would not trouble the local authority to provide accommodation for classes to teach their own special doctrines. Speaking for the denomination to which he belonged he would be no party to any attempt to place religious teachers in any transferred schools to teach Nonconformist doctrines. He did not believe in the doctrines of his own or any other religion being taught in schools at the public expense. If the right of entry was fairly administered and no undue pressure was put upon parents to make their selection; if this measure was fairly and honestly administered on all sides both by the Board of Education and by those who had influence with the parents, he felt sure that Free Churches as a whole would not desire to have any representative teacher in those schools teaching their own doctrine. Therefore, it would resolve itself practically in most of the transferred schools where facilities were desired into either Anglicans or Roman Catholics, and in the vast majority of cases the special instruction would be for the Anglicans alone. Therefore, all the doubts as to whether there would be available accommodation for this special teaching might be set at rest, because the accommodation required so far as the number of class-rooms was concerned would be very limited. He hoped hon. Gentlemen opposite would feel that this was not an impossible condition, and the Board of Education if they desired honestly to administer this clause would have no difficulty in the great majority of cases in doing it.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said he was not animated by any acute suspicion of the local authorities in this matter, but he wished to put it to the Secretary to the Board of Education that the wording of this clause, even as amended by his right hon. friend's Amendment, which the Government were ready to accept, would only suggest that there was a great difficulty in providing this accommodation in any school which only contained one room. If a local authority put that interpretation upon the wording of the Act they would not be liable to be accused of any unworthy conduct. It would be a mistake to suggest that this instruction could not be given in a school with only one room. Perhaps the hon. Member opposite was not aware that the Leader of the Opposition received the whole of his secular instruction before he went to a public school in a school with one room in which four classes were conducted.

*MR. TREVELYAN said that two years after that he was taught in the same room. He had already mentioned that he thought more than one class could be taught in a room.

MR. WYNDHAM said he did not hear the hon. Gentleman say that. That being so, he thought they would make a mistake if they were to suggest, as they would do by the language of the clause, to the local education authorities that there was some insurmountable difficulty in the way of giving religious instruction of a separate character for three-quarters of an hour in a school which had only one room. The Secretary to the Board of Education had told them that there were very few schools in which any pretence of a difficulty could arise. They had also been told that there were many schools in which no parents would desire to have this right of entry at all. He suspected that these two classes largely coincided, and that the cases in which any real difficulty could be put forward for not acting in the spirit of the Act must be few indeed. If that was so, would they not really make the task of the local education authorities easier, and not harder, if they said quite explicitly in the Bill that these facilities should be given? He could imagine the case of a local authority being very anxious to give these facilities, but being impressed by the opposition of some who took a more violent view of these matters, with the result that the local authority, looking to the fact that the school consisted of only one room, would say that the language of the Act did not clearly impose the obligation. He thought the local authority would have an easier task if, when pressure was put on them, they were able to say that the words of the Act required that facilities should be provided. That, he believed, was the intention of the Government, and it was also the course which the local authorities would almost in every case pursue.

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) said he regretted that on the present occasion he must separate himself from the hon. Member for Blackpool. It appeared to him that this Amendment was really not the right of entry, but the right of construction, which was a very different thing. Construction must cost money, but his hon. friend had not explained from what fund that cost was to be defrayed. He had a shrewd suspicion, however, on reading the Amendment and the Bill together, that the fund would be the local rate. Thus, at a time when the passive resister had betaken himself to wholesome slumber, they would be adopting a course which would again arouse him to action. Such a step, he thought, would be a mistake. He was very much struck by what the Under-Secretary had said as to the sentiment of peace which now prevailed in his constituency. He knew something of that district, because many years ago he was the representative of that division of the West Riding, and he knew the intensity of the Nonconformist feeling in that most beautiful valley. It was a matter of great consolation to him to hear of the improved condition of feeling that the hon. Gentleman had described in such graphic terms. He desired most anxiously that this Bill should become law. He believed that if it did become law it would, duly amended, mean moderation where there had hitherto been extravagance, peace where there had been warfare, and co-operation where there had been constant antagonism.

*MR. NAPIER said he wished to make one observation in the hope that it would calm the fears of hon. Gentlemen opposite. He was certain they were anxious that those fears should be calmed. He assumed that the calculation was right that there were 900 schools in the country which had only a single room available for teaching, and that even according to the calculation of hon. Gentlemen opposite only about three county councils might be recalcitrant. There were about sixty county councils altogether in England. That meant that one-twentieth might conceivably have intentions hostile to the Act, and might endeavour, so far as they could, to refuse facilities. If it was assumed that the single-room schools were spread tolerably equally over the whole country, that would bring the House to the conclusion that there were forty-five single-room schools in the possibly recalcitrant counties. How would the position stand in relation to them? There might be partitions in some of these school-rooms, and, if not, partitions could be put up. If the Government accepted the Amendment of the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for East Worcestershire, as they had expressed their intention of doing, the Board of Education would be able to compel the county councils to put up partitions in all the single-room schools, so that the whole difficulty would be reduced to nothing at all.

MR. RAWLINSON said that this Amendment, if it stood alone, would not be of serious importance. He wished to point out that, as the Bill stood now, there was no sort of obligation on the local education authority to carry out what was intended in this matter. He concurred with the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk in deprecating suspicions on one side or the other. But lawyers knew that nothing was more liable to lead to unpleasantness and litigation than for one party to an agreement to say to the other party: "Do not be suspicious of me, do not put it down in black and white, and I will not be suspicious of you." The hon. Gentleman himself would not have attained his present position if he had conducted his business on those lines. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Education had referred to the position in the West Riding of Yorkshire. There were pretty keen business men in that part of the country, and if one or two passive resisters had said that they were quite content with what the Government proposed, it might be taken that they knew how the proposed arrangement would work. If he might give the local authority a bit of gratuitous legal advice he would advise them that they would be perfectly safe in signing this document, for he believed that there was absolutely no remedy against them in case they did not fulfil their side of the bargain. It was not a question of suspicion or of personal trust of the President of the Board of Education. It was better to have these things in black and white so that no dispute could afterwards arise. If the Government really meant to make the providing of accommodation, so far as practicable, obligatory, some general words should be put into this Bill as had been done in the Children Bill this year. Once the duty was put on the local education authorities in that way, there would be a remedy against those who might be recalcitrant. If the course he suggested were followed, local education authorities would be able to hold the balance evenly as between Nonconformists and denominationalists. Unless the Government saw their way to meet this point, it seemed to him that the Committee were being asked, so to speak, to sign a document which involved confidence on the other side in regard to a matter which should be put clearly in black and white.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
 Hutton and Mr. Clement Edwards.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress; and ask leave to sit again"—(Mr. Runciman)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (ENGLAND AND WALES) [GRANTS].

Resolution reported, "That it is expedient to authorise the payment of Parliamentary Grants to associations of schools in respect of every public elementary school belonging to such associations, and of a Parliamentary Grant in respect of instruction given in special subjects at centres, in pursuance of any Act of the present Session to make further provision with respect to Elementary Education in England and Wales."

Resolution read a second time.

*MR. TREVELYAN said his right hon. friend the President of the Board of Education had asked him to move the Report of this Resolution, because under the rules of the House he would not be able to speak twice, and he wished to hear the criticisms which might be desired to be made by the other side before he answered at a later stage of the proceedings. At this stage, there was, he thought, no need for him to go at any length into the position of the Government. The Prime Minister had said that what the Government proposed and desired was that contracted-out denominational schools should be given a reasonable chance of existence, leaving, however, a substantial burden to be borne by the denomination. He thought the main part of the House was on common ground, at any rate in theory, with regard to these schools. They all agreed that it was educationally disadvantageous to have any large number of contracted-out schools. Therefore, they did not want to encourage needlessly contracting-out. They were also aware that there was, in certain classes of the community, a conscientious dislike to the terms under which most of the schools were asked to accept a national settlement, and, therefore, it was not desired to make contracting-out impossible. Since this discussion had started, a certain number of Members of the House and of people outside the House had been practically, if not actually, asking the Government to make the grants equivalent to the present rates. So far as the Government were concerned, that, or anything like that, was impossible, because where then would be the national settlement—[An HON. MEMBER: Where is it now?]—if all the thousands of contracted-out schools were to have an easy opportunity of standing out of a national system? The view of the Government was that there must be a real and substantial burden on the schools which stood out, but that there must not be required of them any ruinous sacrifice.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): Semi-starvation.

*MR. TREVELYAN said his right hon. friend had had figures put before him by the representatives of various denominations, but he did not believe that any denomination had proved that the figures of the Government would not meet both those requirements. His right hon. friend invited criticism, but the more he examined the figures put forward by the Government, and when he considered the pooling arrangements of the grants according to the size of the schools, the more satisfied his right hon. friend was that the Government estimate was about right—namely, that something like 85 per cent. of the maintenance of the schools would be provided by the Government grants, and that something like 15 per cent. would remain to be found by the denominations. If those figures were correct, it was for the House to decide, after discussion, whether that was too much to ask the Churches who stood out of the national settlement to pay for the sake of privately controlling the schools and of the private patronage it brought. He begged to move.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Before the hon. Gentleman sits down, can he tell us how the negotiations now stand with the Archbishop of Canterbury?

MR. TREVELYAN: My right hon. friend will say something about that, but I am not in a position to say anything about it.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford), said that apparently the hon. Gentleman believed that nothing could be a national settlement unless it inflicted some sacrifice upon a large minority. He had risen for the purpose of entering a protest against the extraordinary position in which the House was placed at that moment. When the other night they were trying to discuss, indirectly at any rate, the first Schedule to this Bill and the amount of the grant to be provided, they were told that the Government were still considering this question and had asked for figures from various denominations, that they had received some of these figures and were making elaborate calculations with regard to them, and that when those calculations were completed, the Government would to-day on this Motion through the lips of the Prime Minister make a statement as to what the financial arrangement was to be. Yet, in the face of that pledge, they are now asked to commence a discussion upon the financial basis of the Bill without any financial statement whatever being made, without knowing whether they were discussing the first Schedule or not—

MR. RUNCIMAN : I can tell the hon. Gentleman at once. It is the first Schedule of the Bill and I take it that is the one we are now discussing.

MR. JOHN REDMOND asked whether he was to take it from that that the negotiations had led to nothing. Was he to understand from that that the Government stood or fell by the Schedule and by the Schedule alone, or was he to understand that the Schedule was to be increased or enlarged? They were entitled to some better treatment than that. He submitted that that was trifling with the House. He ought to be informed whether the first Schedule contained the whole financial programme of the Government, or whether the Government were still considering whether that Schedule should be enlarged, whether they were still negotiating on the question as to whether it should be enlarged or not. If the matter was still in suspense, he honestly thought the discussion should be adjourned. If the Government were negotiating to see how much further they could go to satisfy those who were asking for more, ought the discussion to go on? Through long years he had witnessed a series of new rules of procedure in the House which, he agreed with the Leader of the Opposition, had gradually reduced the House to a position almost of contempt, but he did not know of any instance in the past of such utter contempt of the House of Commons as that of asking them solemnly to undertake the discussion of the financial basis of this Bill when the Government would neither tell them whether they were negotiating and endeavouring to enlarge that basis, nor on the other hand, whether they were going to stand by that basis. What were they going to discuss? Were they going to discuss this 49s. 6d. per child? What was the use of discussing it if they were at that very moment engaged in discussion and negotiation to see whether they could not go further to meet the further claims which had been made? He thought the House of Commons was being treated badly in the matter, and speaking for those whom Irish Members represented, he thought they had grave reason to complain. They were told their figures were disputed. They were asked to submit them for examination. Their figures had been submitted to examination. The most full and detailed statistics had been collected—not from Blue-books or general averages; he doubted if the Church of England had done the same—but statistics drawn from every individual Catholic school in England. They had been examined now for many days, and would it be believed that at that moment when they were asked to undertake this discussion, they had received from those to whom they had submitted the figures no statement of any sort or kind as to whether their figures were correct or incorrect, or as to what was the opinion of the Government experts upon them? He thought they had grave reason to complain. Up to this moment they had heard nothing whatever from the Government with reference to the figures, and he drew from that fact this conclusion: that the experts of the Government and the Education Office had found it impossible substantially to differ from their figures. Now he would, in a few words—because he did not want to make a long speech—deal with the various general aspects of the question at the moment. He felt it was almost useless to do so when they did not know what the position of the Government was or what their proposals were, but he felt it his duty the moment this financial aspect of the question came up, to put their case with reference to these Schedules. Now the figures they had proposed were drawn from each individual school in the country, and they went to show that the total expenditure on the Catholic schools of England and Wales at this moment was £830,000 a year. Taking the proposed grant of the Government in this schedule at 50s. per child—that was something more than the amount of the grant—it would amount to £712,000, leaving a deficit of £120,000 for the Catholic schools of England and Wales. The President of the Board of Education spoke the other day of their having claimed a deficit of £300,000 upon their schools. No responsible person made any such statement. Was it made by anyone on these benches?

MR. RUNCIMAN: No, I did not say it was made by anyone in the House. I said the statements were made on behalf of the Roman Catholic authorities and I quoted the statement.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: By whom was it made?

MR. RUNCIMAN: It was made by one of the dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: May I ask the name? I utterly deny it was ever made by any responsible person. It might have been made in newspapers, but so far as the responsible leaders in this House, or responsible leaders outside it were concerned, no such statement was made. The statement made was that there would be a deficit of £120,000 for the whole of England and Wales. Of these figures they challenged contradiction. He would take by way of illustration, first of all, London. He had the estimate of the deficit in London prepared by the diocesan authority. Excluding the charge for furniture—he would deal with that in a moment—it amounted to £34,094. The authorities, in order to make sure that they were right, had these figures checked by the London County Council—the Education Authority—and he had there the official figures of the London County Council. The salaries alone amounted to £83,600, or 58s. 8d. per head; } wear and tear,

Mr. John Redmond.

£1,068 15s., or 9d. per child; cleaning, £8,906 5s., or 6s. 3d. per child; books, £5,225, or 3s. 8d. per child; total maintenance, £15,200, or 10s. 8d. per child. Total cost, including salaries and maintenance, £98,800 a year, or 69s. 4d. per head. The grant proposed in the Schedule was £70,705, or 49s. 8d. per head, a deficit of £28,085 per year, or 19s. 8d. per head.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London): What is the total per child?

MR. JOHN REDMOND said the total of maintenance and salaries now was £98,800, or 69s. 4d. per child, in the Catholic schools. The grant according to the Schedule for salaries and maintenance would be £70,705 or 49s. 8d. per child per annum, which left a deficit of £28,085 per annum, or 19s. 8d. per head. Take the salaries alone. They amounted now to £83,600; the total given by the Schedule for salaries was £70,755; therefore in London alone there would be a deficit on salaries, not to speak of anything else, of £12,825. The right hon. Gentleman would notice that he was not including in the charges maintenance or any of the matters mentioned in the White Paper to which he took exception the other night as not fairly to be counted as maintenance. He was only taking salaries, wear and tear, cleaning, and books. If they included furniture it raised the amount very much. How did furniture stand? The moment this Bill passed, the furniture would cease to belong to the Catholic schools. The whole of it would be taken away from them altogether, or they would have to pay for it either in a lump sum or have the amount spread over a number of years. These were the County Council figures which he was quoting now, not the figures of the diocesan authorities. If they included furniture then they had £83,600 for salaries; for maintenance, £15,200; for furniture, £4,631 5s., or 3s. 3d. per head; and the total cost of maintenance, furniture and salaries was £103,431 5s.; less the amount of grant, £70,775; leaving a deficit of £32,656 5s., or 22s. 11d. per child. That brought the checked figures of the London County Council within between £2,000 and £3,000 of the figure which was originally quoted by the diocesan body. He quoted these figures as an illustration of the figures given by the Catholic body, as a checked and authorised statement of the case in London, and as a proof that their total figure of £120,000 a year deficit over the whole country was a correct figure. But it might be said that while he was sure of his figures which had been checked as to London, he could not say the same for the rest of the country. He had the total figures for Liverpool, which also had been checked by the local education authority of the town council. They showed a deficit in Liverpool of £11,500 a year in the thirty-five schools. They had got the details of other places in England and Wales. He did not want to quote them all, but he wished to give two or three illustrations in order to impress upon the House the accuracy of their figures, which had been checked by the local education authorities. If he took smaller places, he found that in Widnes there was a deficit of £1,039; and in Warrington—he quoted these small places in order to make his illustration complete—the deficit was £487. All through, these figures, as checked by the local authorities, went to show that their estimate of £120,000 a year deficit over the whole of England on the Schedule of the right hon. Gentleman was an accurate figure. Let him deal with one other matter. It had been suggested to them that by the system of pooling, as it was called, they would be able to redress the balance, and that the great loss of £32,000 in London would be made up by the profit on the 50s. per child in other parts of England and Wales. They had gone most elaborately into those figures, and the pooling would be of absolutely no use to them at all. According to the figures which he had there were only two dioceses in England or Wales where there would be a profit, and in both the profit was insignificant. In the diocese of Menevia in Wales, he was told that there would be a profit of £340; and there would be a profit in Newport of £1,440. He was told that in no other diocese in England and Wales would there be any profit. Of what use was this pooling; of what advantage was it to Catholics? Where were the schools in London to look for the £32,000 a year to enable them to make up that enormous deficit? The pooling was of absolutely no use. The Schedule as it stood, even with this pooling, meant for the Catholic schools of England semi-starvation and practical ruin. What would happen? If it were carried out, well-paid teachers would have to be dismissed and badly-paid teachers put in their place. The small classes into which these schools had been properly broken up of recent years would have to be amalgamated. They could not by any possibility have efficient schools even if the cost of education remained as it was, but they all knew the cost of education was rising and would rise, and in point of fact when he quoted the county council figures for these schools in London he had understated the case, because the salaries, £83,600, giving 58s. 8d. per head had since then been raised 2s. per head, and the figures he gave therefore were to that extent underestimates. They knew that the cost would increase rapidly. This system would mean for their schools inefficiency, starvation, and destruction. His colleagues and he took the strongest view against the whole principle of contracting-out. They were opposed to it root and branch, but he did not think that was the right opportunity for him to argue the principle of contracting-out, and he wanted to confine himself simply to the finance of the Bill, which was ruinous to these schools. He complained that their figures which were sent to be checked, if they had been checked, had not received the attention of the Government. If they had been found to be correct they ought to have been told of it. If they had been found to be incorrect they also ought to have been told so. He complained of the way they had been dealt with in this matter. He complained of the way the House of Commons had been dealt with. He had, during those few moments, been discussing the Schedule. He felt bound on the first opportunity to state their case and give their figures, but in a sense he was beating the air. He was talking about a Schedule which, for all he knew, did not exist, a mere shadow, and they were entitled to know from the right hon. Gentleman did the Government stand by its Schedule. If it did not, what Schedule did it stand by? At any rate, so far as they were concerned, speaking on the figures in the Schedule and from the statistics he had quoted, nothing could induce them to refrain from the most vehement opposition to every stage of the Bill.

MR. LYTTLETON (St. George's, Hanover Square) said that from the first he had desired a settlement of this question, but he had stated, and he trusted made clear, to the House that that desire was subject to the reservation that equitable treatment among other things should be shown to contracting-out schools and upon the question of transfer. He wanted to associate himself with the hon. Member who had just spoken when he said that in this matter it was not fair that the House should be kept so much in the dark as it had been day after day, and that those who favoured the settlement of this matter should be compelled to cast their vote in a state of uncertainty upon subjects of great importance. They were compelled to sink their opinions for the time being in expectation of promises being fulfilled when no means had been afforded and no statement of any sort had been made which would enable the House to decide whether those promises could be fulfilled. They were in the dark as to the finance of the Bill and as to the most important question of training colleges. Until that day he had had no communication with the Archbishop of Canterbury, who had thought it was more desirable to conduct the negotiations apart from Members of the House. But the Archbishop had made a communication to him on this subject which it was right that the Government and the House should know. He held in the strongest way that it was the duty of the Government, having at their command the experience and the resources of the Education Department, to justify their own figures, and to give the House a perfectly clear statement as to the material on which they based them. His personal view was that the figures in the circumstances should be liberal and generous, and, above all, that the House should have time to consider them. The Government had not taken that view, however. On the contrary, they had asked the Church of England, the Roman Catholics, and those who dissented from the Bill and wished to stand outside its provisions, to bring forward their own figures and to justify them, they having nothing approaching the opportunity, experience, or organisation which the Board of Education had, and he presumed from the attitude they had taken up in regard to this schedule they intended to criticise those figures. Let the House not mistake him. He did not deny that, so far as he could judge, there had been great difficulty in getting any definite figures on such a vast subject in a short space of time. He proposed, however, to rely for the validity of the position which was taken up by the Archbishop in this matter on the official figures supplied by the Department. In the communication received from the Archbishop of Canterbury addressed to the President of the Board of Education it was stated that the figures for the transfer schools were utterly inadequate, and that the amount which would be demanded on the basis of the Government proposals from the voluntary schools would be a contribution of 14s. 6d. per child. These were the views of the Archbishop—

Mr. John Redmond.

“The transfer and contracting-out provisions must be looked at as a whole. It is clear, therefore, that if the contracting-out schools are to be maintained efficiently without an impossible strain upon voluntary subscribers the amount of the grants set out in the schedule must be increased in each case at least 7s., and there must be a further provision that they are to rise automatically year by year with the average expenditure for the whole country as set forth on page 3 of the White Paper already referred to. Unless you can concede these essential matters, I am obliged to say that the schedule will, in my opinion, take away what the Bill purports to give, and consequently it would seem that the settlement which seemed attainable as the result of our correspondence cannot be carried out. In that case it would be useless to discuss the many important points which seem to me to call for amendment in the Bill itself, and especially in Clause 2 with regard to facilities. It gives me genuine distress that I should thus be obliged to contemplate at this stage of our discussion a result which, in my view at least, would be a real calamity to the interests of educational and religious peace: but I feel that it is necessary to speak explicitly on what, as you will know, I have regarded from the first as an essential part of any scheme of settlement. I am so well assured of your desire being in harmony with my own that I will not despair of your being able to take such steps as are possible for making your whole scheme a consistent and practical one, and thus effecting what will in the long run—despite present criticism and fears—redound to the country's good."

In a postscript it was added that—

"The Representative Church Council meets on Thursday, and will reasonably expect from me a definite statement."

No settlement either differing from or in accord with the representations of that letter had been made by the right hon. Gentleman, and it appeared that the Archbishop, who had shown the most earnest zeal in the interests of peace, had found the financial provisions of the Bill utterly inadequate. He claimed that the Archbishop had shown great moderation in the statement of his views, though he wished to guard himself from accepting fully the standard which the Primate had mentioned as the minimum which he could possibly accept. He did this because he had heard the statement of the last speaker, and he had also before him the White Paper which seemed to him to prove that the Archbishop's request was a very moderate one in the circumstances. This Paper showed that the expenditure per child over the country was 64s. 10d. He was aware that this figure had been repudiated on behalf of the Government as containing matters regarding deductions of an important character. He had tried to look into the question, and he declared that the Paper as it stood was meant for the information of the public and not for the benefit of educational experts. What were the deductions which the President of the Board of Education had indicated ought to be made? He agreed that some deductions ought to be made in respect of the conveyance of children to schools—a trifling matter. There were deductions which he dared say would amount to 3s. 4d. per child for rates and insurance of school buildings. There was a deduction which could properly be made and which would come to very little for the purchase of land and the erection, alteration, and maintenance of school buildings. He agreed that where a school was purchased a deduction would have to be made, but he did not think the right hon. Gentleman would say that was an expenditure which had to be made except in very rare instances. He invited the right hon. Gentleman to show that the deductions referred to

were not balanced by the additions which would necessarily fall on the contracting-out schools. The White Paper did not show the real average expenditure, because the general standard of the voluntary schools had not reached its highest point. In the next place, the country schools brought the whole average down, and he submitted that the vast number of country schools would not be able to contract-out at all. That was an important set-off against some of the deductions which he admitted had to be made. Take a more important matter still. The contracting-out schools would have the whole upkeep laid upon their shoulders, a most formidable item which did not exist at the present time. Then, lastly, there were the administrative charges, which the White Paper eliminated altogether. These could not be taken altogether off the contracting-out schools, for in future the whole administrative charges would fall on the contracting-out authority. He was informed that as far as an investigation had been able to be made by the authorities of the Church of England in the short time available, the figures gained from 140 schools in divers parts of the country seemed to corroborate the conclusions arrived at in the White Paper—namely, that 64s. 10d. was the average and legitimate expenditure which was made by the local authorities on the schools of the country. It seemed to him, therefore, that the request of the Archbishop—namely, that the rough average grant of 50s. should at the very least be added to by 7s.—was a moderate demand on the face of the only figures they had before them on official authority. He did not for one moment wish to underrate the case presented by the hon. and learned Member for Waterford, and it was quite obvious from the greater consolidation and concentration of the schools for which he spoke that they had been able to get fair, complete, and accurate statistics, and therefore they were able to draw from them a more definite conclusion. All he wished to say was that the Archbishop's request seemed to be considerably under rather than over the cost. He wished to say that it had been to the honour of those who had spoken upon that side that they had firmly declared that contracting-out schools were never to fall below the provided schools of the country, and the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, in the speech he made, indicated that progress would involve further expense. Was it really to be contended that under a concordat and settlement which many of them wished to see carried through, the schools of the Church of England and the Roman Catholics as well should be placed upon a far lower standard than that which was enjoyed by their rival schools in the country? The effort of peace which was being made upon the basis of contracting-out was only being accepted on condition that those who accepted it would subject themselves to a strain far more intolerable than they endured before 1902. He wished to say in conclusion that he did not desire to use any provocative word upon this matter. The settlement, if it was to be a settlement, ought not to break down upon a point of finance. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh, oh!"] Well, it ought not to break down on that point. There were far greater sacrifices to be made by both sides. There were sacrifices of most dearly-loved and cherished convictions which had to be made by hon. Members on both sides. And he said with absolute sincerity that it would be absolutely useless to ask people to make such sacrifices of convictions which were dear to them if there was at the same time to be placed on the shoulders of those making them a burden quite intolerable, which would condemn these schools to a lower standard of efficiency.

*SIR GEORGE WHITE said that, although many of them had heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman with very great regret, and specially the communication from the Archbishop, none could find any fault with the tone of the speech. He should endeavour to emulate that tone. He could not, however, agree with the expression of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to a question of this sort breaking down on a matter of finance when the matter of finance was so intimately connected with one of the essential principles of the Bill. He had at different periods of the history of educational controversies said that under certain conditions he might agree to the right of entry, and that under certain conditions he might agree to contracting-out, but under no circumstances that he could foresee could he agree to the two operating in one area; and yet to a certain extent that was the position in which they were placed by this Bill. They were brought to that condition of things solely by the belief that at least those belonging to the Anglican Church would have been very largely, if not wholly, content with the operation of the principle of the right of entry, and would not have sought to enlarge the opportunities for contracting-out. Therefore, he was quite sure the House would see that the question of finance was so intimately connected with this great principle that it was impossible to look upon it as a light matter. What would be the position of those who had received a good deal of blame from their friends already if they consented to the right of entry in the towns and in other districts not single school areas—placing them in the position in which he believed they would be placed if they acceded to the figure named by the right hon. Gentleman and allowed the right of entry in all the council schools, at the same time giving every facility for contracting out for the whole of the denominational schools if they chose to do so! They could not face such a figure as that which was named by the right hon. Gentleman because they felt that sum would place every possible facility, so far as finance was concerned, in the way of contracting out. In the course of a long life he had had a good deal to do with educational figures, and he was bound to say that there was no class of figures which laid themselves open to so much misrepresentation and misunderstanding; therefore, it would be an extremely difficult thing to get at what was the exact cost of education under all the circumstances under which those contracting-out schools would exist. From his own experience and knowledge, as well as from the information he had been able to gather, he felt that the figure which the Government had put into the Schedule was a liberal figure. Bearing in mind always the limitations which they had endeavoured to place upon the contracting-out system, namely that those who engaged in it should at least have some reasonable sum to subscribe themselves as they did years ago under similar circumstances, they could not watch that sum absolutely disappearing and be content to go on with this arrangement under those conditions. He took up this position with very great regret, and he did so because they had reached a stage in the compromise which was a very serious one indeed. He would go so far as to state that the position of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the future attitude which the education authority might take in the interest of education in all the schools of the country would not be an unreasonable position, or that those demands as they applied to contracted-out schools should be reasonably met by the Board of Education in regard to future finance. He thought that was a reasonable proposition, but in regard to the present situation for him and his friends, with the figures before them which they had endeavoured to get as accurately as they possibly could, to consent to a condition of things in which they would be promptly charged with handing over the whole of the town schools to denominational schools, either through contracting out or the right of entry, would be to assume a position of which he for one could not take the responsibility, and he felt if this demand was persisted in, he personally should have to use all the influence he possessed to bring the compromise to an end. He hoped they had not even yet reached that position. He trusted the President of the Board of Education would be able to put figures before the Committee—figures which ought to be authentic, for the Board of Education was certainly the only body so far as he knew who could really ascertain what was the exact expenditure for education in the country. He was quite sure they all credited the right hon. Gentleman with the desire to put the facts as they were before the Committee and give the best information at their disposal. He would fain hope that there was some way out of the position in which they found themselves. He felt that there was a great difficulty also in regard to his hon. friends below the gangway. What he had to say in regard to them he would put in the form of a question, and he hoped it would not be misinterpreted. He presumed that his hon. friends had in calculating the cost of their schools calculated the full salaries paid by the local authorities to all their teachers. They were perfectly justified in so calculating the salaries, but at the same time the deficiency between what the grant would yield and the amount of the expenditure credited to the salaries paid by the local authorities could not be said to be altogether a loss to their Church. It was a matter in which non-Catholics had no right to interfere in the slightest degree, but still it was a matter they might very well take into consideration in calculating what was the actual pecuniary difference which they would have to make up as against what they now received from the local authorities. He very much regretted to have to make this statement. He had certain responsibilities which had induced him to make it thus early, but he did not yet give up all hope that some way might be seen out of this dilemma. He was sure that if hon. Gentlemen would try to understand the position of those he represented, namely, that at this moment there was a prospect of all their town schools being practically in a greater or less degree put under denominational influence, they would feel that he was justified in taking up this position.

MR. DILLON said that while recognising the sympathetic and generous tone of the speech of the hon. Member for North West Norfolk he thought it must be evident to everyone in the House that the Catholic schools had no locus standi in this compromise. He must say a word in support of the position taken up by the hon. Member for Waterford. The hon. Member opposite seemed to have forgotten that the House were now discussing the financial Resolution, on which the First Schedule of the Bill depended. They were in the awkward position of not having had the statement in regard to the finances of the Bill promised by the Prime Minister, which was necessary to enable them in a really rational and useful way to discuss this Resolution. Although they had been led to believe that the mind of the Government was not made up and that the Schedule was being revised, they were now debating in ignorance of what the mind of the Government was. The hon. Member for North West Norfolk had made an obscure hint as to the effect of the deficit which from carefully prepared figures the Catholic representatives had shown would fall upon their Church. He did not understand the hon. Member's remark, and he could only guess at its meaning. He presumed that there was an impression abroad that they would have to sweat the nuns, and that the Catholic Church had a certain body who would teach for nothing. That was a complete delusion. Those bodies did teach in some of the Catholic schools, and their teaching was so much sought after that it had been a matter of great embarrassment to find a considerable number of Protestants coming into their schools. These Protestants came in without being asked. Was it not very mean, though the nuns were earning their living and because they lived on very little, to take up the position, as the hon. Member had done, that they ought to be paid on a lower scale?

*SIR GEORGE WHITE said what he meant was that when the Education Act of 1902 came into force a great number of salaries of Catholic teachers were certainly doubled, or at all events very largely increased by their being placed as they were bound to be on the status of other teachers. It was acknowledged at that time that those teachers were receiving small salaries, and that they in the interest of their Church were doing what was practically mission work. He did not deny for one moment that these teachers had a right to do what they liked with the salaries paid to them, but these salaries had been increased by many thousands of pounds by the Act of 1902.

MR. DILLON said he knew the hon. Member too well to imagine that he was so ungenerous as to suggest that the salaries of Catholic teachers should be cut down again. After all, in this matter a man was entitled to a fair wage, and it was most ungenerous and unfair—he did not make any charge against the hon. Member—to go behind and ask what he did with the money. They were not entitled to do that. Were they going to fine men or women because they had devoted the wages they received for work done to a religious purpose? Were they going to say to them: "We will fine you, and reduce your wages, because you choose to devote those wages to some purpose we do not approve of"? They had no right to do that. Any public teacher who did his work had as good a right to draw his wages as any teacher in the country. It was an extraordinary position for anyone to take up to say that, as a condition of the national settlement, the salaries of the Catholic teachers in this country should be fined down below those of other teachers.

*SIR GEORGE WHITE: I never made any suggestion of the kind.

MR. DILLON: I do not think the hon. Member fully gave the bearing of his remark, but if it had any meaning it meant that—

*SIR GEORGE WHITE: I disavow any such intention.

MR. DILLON asked how on earth salaries were to be kept up if the Catholic teachers did not come on the same scale as others. If they were not so paid, the deficit would fall upon the Catholic body. He wished to know how they could discuss Clause 3 to-morrow unless they knew fully the financial aspect of the question. The representatives of the Catholics had stated over and over again that they were opposed to contracting out; they had pointed out the dangers they foresaw; but they had never denied that their attitude towards the granting of contracting out would be largely modified by the amount of money they were going to receive. If the hon. Member opposite had indicated a sliding scale which would move in accordance with the general course of education in the country, and place Catholic schools in a permanent position of equality with the other schools of the country, that would largely modify their objection to contracting out. He still adhered to his view that the other settlement would be better, but how could they approach the discussion of Clause 3 until they knew the final decision of the Government in regard to the Schedule and contracting-out? Contracting-out might be tolerable if they were going to get a fair grant, but it would be intolerable if it meant the slow starvation of their schools. He had received that morning a resolution passed by the Synod of the United Diocese of Cork and Ross strongly protesting against the closing of certain small schools, on the ground that it would be a gross injustice to the members of their Church, namely, the Protestant Church in Ireland. He would point out that in Ireland there was a regulation that wherever Protestants were in a small minority in a Catholic parish, if they could gather not thirty but ten children they had a school of their own, paid for entirely out of public funds and under Protestant management, and without any inequality whatsoever. He asked the House to compare that with the treatment given to Catholic schools in this country. The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk reminded Catholics the other day that they were only a small minority asking that there should be Catholic schools with Catholic teachers in a Protestant country. There was a minority of Protestants in Ireland, which was a Catholic country. Supposing the Irish people got Home Rule to-morrow, or even if they did not get it, supposing they had popular control of education in Ireland, and they said: "We are a Catholic country, and we decline to give to the Protestants of Ireland their Protestant schools." Supposing they said further: "We shall set up in this Catholic country that form of religious teaching which is acceptable to the majority of the population; we will establish and endow that religious teaching in the schools of Ireland"; and, supposing that they said to the Protestants of Ireland who were in the minority, that they might contract-out, but if they did they must be prepared to bear a considerable burden for the privilege of contracting-out. They had suffered too long to attempt anything of the kind, and if they had Home Rule to-morrow they would not close one of the Protestant schools. But supposing they did; and that the Protestant minority in Ireland came over here and appealed to the party opposite for justice against such oppression, how could they answer them if they were going to do to the Catholics of this country precisely what the Protestants of Ireland would then complain of? They were not teaching them a good lesson in Ireland by this conduct. Last year, when this question was first raised, the Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, and other Protestants came to him personally and appealed to him to go to the Government to save their small Protestant schools, and he saw the Chief Secretary on the subject. He had a letter of thanks from the Provost of Trinity College for his assistance in keeping these small Protestant schools open. They did not require to get thirty children to keep them open as was proposed here. Some of these small Protestant schools had only ten children, and in some parishes in the South of Ireland only half a dozen, but these small schools were paid for in every respect the same as the Catholic schools. The question of religious equality was not affected by this question of the rates. In Ireland the education system was a State system. What he was asking here on this particular matter was not assistance from the rates, but assistance from the taxes. Again he asked, were they setting Ireland a good example in this matter? He contended that the facts proved that the Catholic majority in Ireland were more broad-minded and more generous to the Protestant minority than the Protestant majority in this country were in their treatment of the Catholic minority. Before he sat down he wanted to point out that there was another element of inequality in this treatment which made his case stronger in the matter of the upkeep of the school buildings. In Ireland the Protestant minority was the minority of wealth; they were the landlords and the professional classes, and could well afford to bear this burden of the upkeep of the buildings; but here it was proposed to inflict this fine for conscience' sake—for, whatever might be said to the contrary, it was a fine for conscience' sake—on the poorest of the whole population of the country. That was an intolerable position to take up, and one which it was impossible to defend. He thought the Catholics had been treated badly by the Government. They were promised a statement, and they ought to know what was the final word of the Government as to this question of grants to the contracted-out schools and forcing the Catholics out of the national system of education in England.

[Several Members on both sides of the House rose to continue the debate, and there were persistent cries from the OPPOSITION benches of "Runciman."]

MR. RUNCIMAN: Hon. Gentlemen opposite need be under no misapprehension. I have no objection to speaking. They must know that I am under the Rules of the House. I wanted, when replying, to cover the whole of the ground, and with Mr. Speaker in the Chair I can only speak once. In the first place, I want to refer to the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Waterford. I think his strictures were a little undeserved. He blamed me for not having got up at once and made a full statement.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: I complained that the statement, which was promised by the Prime Minister, was not given.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The statement that I can give now, I think, will be quite sufficient. The only Schedule that we have under discussion at the present time—we are not, in fact, discussing the terms of that Schedule, but the Resolution which covers it—is that which is now in the Bill; and I think I shall be able to show that in fixing this scale as we did we fixed it on liberal lines. It is not a stingy scale. I think it was the right hon. Gentleman opposite who said that those who managed the voluntary schools had not the information with regard to the cost of maintenance of those schools which is at the command of the Board of Education, but the right hon. Gentleman is really misinformed in that matter. The Board of Education have not got the opportunities or means of knowing or finding out any of the figures for individual schools, and the hon. Gentleman who preceded me in the last Administration at the Board of Education knows that that is the case. As a matter of fact we are really in the hands of the local authorities for much of the information that must be provided if we are to know in full everything that can be known about the maintenance of voluntary schools. I hope, therefore, that the Board of Education will not be blamed for not having fuller information at its command than the managers of those schools. Then most of the local authorities do not keep their accounts for these schools separately and they cannot give it to us, even if we had the right to ask for it from them. The hon and learned Member objected to our not having given him and his friends a full criticism of the whole of the information that has been given to us by the Roman Catholic authorities during the last two days. I will tell the hon. Gentleman why I have not been able to communicate with him earlier. A very large number indeed of the Roman Catholic forms were presented to us about two o'clock on Monday. Many only arrived at three o'clock yesterday, and since then I have had my officials hard at work examining those forms as carefully as they possibly could. No time has been lost, and up to a late hour last night and during the whole of to-day they have been occupied in examining not 140, as has been put forward, but well over 800 schools. That is no small task, and as far as I can give the House information, I am very glad to do so. The hon. and learned Gentleman also objected to a statement of mine that on behalf of the Roman Catholic communion there had been very wild figures used in exaggeration of the sum which might fall on them if they contracted-out. He referred in particular to the figure of £300,000 which I quoted the other day. When I referred to that figure I was quoting from a paper, which I believe is a Roman Catholic paper, called the Tablet, and I quoted that as an instance of the sort of exaggeration which many Members attempt in this House. The noble Lord opposite used very large figures, and I venture to criticise the figures that he put forward on behalf of the Roman Catholic Church. He did not say that this scale would throw a burden of £120,000 on the Roman Catholic Church; he said the figure would be £214,000.

LORD EDMUND TALBOT: I was speaking from the White Paper.

MR. RUNCIMAN: That just shows what an enormous discrepancy there is between the figures of the noble Lord and those which have been carefully compiled by those who represent the Roman Catholic Churches. I shall show both to him and to the Leader of the Opposition that the White Paper does not give, and does not purport to give, the cost of the maintenance of contracted-out schools. Now, if £214,000 upon examination by the Roman Catholic authorities is brought down to £120,000, I think we may take it that the smaller figure is nearer the mark than the larger. The Roman Catholic authorities, who were good enough to place this information at the disposal of the Board of Education, have given us, as far as they possibly could, the actual value. But they have in many cases given us the estimated amounts. So far as I have been able to ascertain from the summary which has been made from the balance-sheets and other figures which have been put before us at the Board of Education, we come approximately to the same result as the hon. and learned Gentleman. But I would point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman that in a very large number of instances the figures are estimated and are so stated in the Paper.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Some of the instances I gave, such as London, Liverpool, and other places, are not estimates, but actual figures checked by the local authorities.

MR. RUNCIMAN: I was going to say that in the case of London, Liverpool, and one or two other places the figures are the actual amounts, but that does not apply to the whole country. A very large number of them are estimated figures. My officials found, in scrutinising these figures, that approximately the total estimated expenditure by the Roman Catholic authorities in their schools will work out at about 58s. 8d. per scholar, and I would commend that to the attention of the right hon. Gentleman opposite who thought that the Archbishop's figure of 64s. was nearer the mark. These are the actual figures from the accounts of 800 Catholic schools. [AN HON. MEMBER: "There are a thousand of them."'] There are about 1,000 of these schools, but those which have been left out of account are immaterial. These are made up of teachers' salaries, which work out at 49s. 11d. per scholar, a figure which does not differ materially from that of the right hon. Gentleman; and of 8s. 9d. per scholar for the other items which have been included in the forms under the head of maintenance. But some of these items are items which do not properly fall under the head of maintenance.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: What are the items which do not properly fall under the head of maintenance?

MR. RUNCIMAN: I will state that later. Therefore the total amount that the Roman Catholics believe will fall on them if this scale is adhered to is £120,000, or about 8s. 9d. per scholar. But some of these estimates are quite clearly very wide of the mark. In one case the estimate for cleaning, warming, and lighting would work out at £1 per scholar, which everyone with experience of schools knows must be very wide of the mark. In most cases it works out at only a few shillings at the outside. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Have you the average attendances?"] I am afraid I have not the average attendances, but I do not think it matters. In other schools the same item is estimated at about 15s. 7d. per scholar, at Nottingham St. Mary's 14s., at Saffron Hill about 11s., and at Ilkley about 10s. It is clear these figures must be a little wide of the mark, but I have no quarrel with the Roman Catholic authorities who have done their best to give us information. The figure for books, apparatus, and stationery at Leeds St. Anne's Higher Grade School is estimated at 15s. 3d. per scholar, and that is the largest figure I have ever heard suggested, and it is very wide of the mark; at Rugby St. Mary's the amount is very nearly 10s. Then there is lumped together for "other expenses," the interpretation of which we have no means of knowing, something like 12s. per scholar at St. Anne's Underwood School, and in another case 9s. 7d., and so on. Thus, a number of the items, in so far as they are estimates, are not good estimates. I do not wish to draw any inference from that except that I am sure that the Roman Catholic authorities have not underestimated the amount of money which they would have to bear. One of the items included for maintenance is repair of the structure. That is a capital charge, and, therefore, it ought not to be put into the account. In two or three cases there is a charge for interest—interest, I presume, on mortgage loans. That, again, is never treated as a maintenance charge. In another case religious inspection is treated as an ordinary charge of maintenance, and in another case there is added in an amount of 12s. per scholar for alterations. I know that the hon. and learned Gentleman would not wish to maintain that those amounts are items which would properly come under the heading of maintenance. And, therefore, with those few criticisms, which I venture to offer as an example of how estimates get out of hand, I would suggest that the Catholic figures are very generous figures from their point of view. I do not think they are as greatly exaggerated as the £240,000 of the noble Lord opposite. They estimate that about 8s. 9d. per scholar would fall upon them under this scale if the child population in their schools did not diminish. But they must be quite aware of the fact that under the altered conditions—the building of new Council schools, and the fact that they have the power to put out of their schools those who are not of their own faith—there must in many instances be a diminution of their school population. I have specially framed the scale in the schedule of this Bill with that in view, and that would, I think, be of material assistance to them. The hon. and learned Gentleman stated that in London the amount per child worked out at about 69s. 8d. each and in Liverpool also at a very large sum. But under a pooling arrangement you cannot take one specific big town, you must take the country as a whole—the cheap schools with the dear schools, and make the money go as far as you can. The amount which the hon. and learned Gentleman says would fall upon them—8s. 9d. per child—may, I think, be diminished slightly because of the over-estimate—because we shall give a larger grant as the schools diminish in size, and for other reasons. In the year 1901 the amount which was produced by the Roman Catholic Church for their schools in this country, so far as we may gather from the published accounts, worked out at about 6s. 5d. per child, or, it may be, 6s. 6d. I do not think there is very much material difference between the estimated 8s. 9d. and the 6s. 5d. which is the actual figure which appears in the published statistics, and when the hon. Gentleman makes a demand that we should really support their schools as if they were still rate-aided, I really must tell him that we cannot do that. The hon. Member must know, and I am bound to say that we cannot make the grants to the contracting-out schools equivalent to what the grants plus the rates have been in the last six years. The hon. and learned Gentleman says then it will be of no use, for they will get no aid out of it. I doubt whether there is any denomination in the country better equipped for pooling arrangements than the Roman Catholic community. The hon. Member for Mayo quoted the Irish case, but I have no doubt the Irish case would be entirely different. If there had been no rate aid given to the denominational schools there would be no education controversy in progress at the present time. If the voluntary schools were still as they are in Ireland and had not been placed upon the rates, we should not have this raging educational controversy now. So that we cannot copy the example of Ireland. Ireland, after all, is a country of small schools, and the fact that they are not so efficient as the schools in this country or in Scotland is due to the fact that they are such small schools. Scotland is much nearer our case than Ireland. The Catholic schools in Scotland are not inefficient, they are very good. In Scotland, where the standard of education is much higher than in Ireland, the cost is 67s. 10d. per child. In Scotland, the Roman Catholics have been able to educate their children well and secure good efficient teachers, and they have received in the past only a 40s. grant from the Exchequer. Therefore, I do not think we are making any unreasonable demand upon the Roman Catholics in England to do what their co-religionists are doing in Scotland. Then the right hon. Gentleman complained that we had kept the House in the dark in regard to the Schedule. We have not kept the House in the dark; it has been on the Table ever since the Bill was printed. The hon. Member must know that I cannot discuss the Schedule in full detail on this Motion, seeing that we have specially arranged the time so that we may have a full discussion of it when we come to it. The right hon. Gentleman quoted from the White Paper, and has made three exceptions, but he omitted four other items which cannot fall on the voluntary schools. Such items as cookery, handicrafts, drawing, etc., are all special expenses. He also mentioned the item for scholarships, an item which is growing rapidly.

MR. LYTTTELTON: Are the contracted-out schools to do without these advantages?

MR. RUNCIMAN: No, Sir. We have specially put in a clause in order that the local authorities may throw open their special facilities.

MR. LYTTTELTON: Yes, "may."

MR. RUNCIMAN: We cannot take the local authorities by the throat and compel them to do for the voluntary schools what they are not compelled to do for their own schools. I do not think the local authorities will be at all captious over these facilities, for they are all only too anxious to see the children in their own localities properly educated. Moreover, it cannot be suggested there is a religious difficulty either in the handicrafts or the cookery centres. Then the items for erection and alterations should come upon capital account.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON: Does the right hon. Gentleman suggest that the contracted-out schools will never require alteration or enlargement?

MR. RUNCIMAN: No, but those are not maintenance, but capital charges. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman is not going to suggest that the State ought to bear the capital charges of the voluntary schools. The wear and tear charges are not likely to be heavy. I cannot understand whether the right hon. Gentleman wishes to throw the administrative charges of these schools and these associations on the rates, and it surely cannot be solemnly suggested that we should vote money for the salaries and administrative expenses of the National Society. That is quite unreasonable, and I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman cannot have looked very closely into that item. I have never heard of a claim of that kind being put forward by any other portion of the voluntary schools. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to refer with a certain amount of brevity and reticence to a communication which passed to-day between the Archbishop of Canterbury and myself. In that letter the Archbishop of Canterbury relies upon the figures presented to him for 140 schools. These figures were presented to me not as a full statement of the case of the Church schools, as was done in the case of the Catholic schools, but as a sample of the case of the Church schools. [HON. MEMBER on the Opposition Benches: "The full case could not be presented in regard to so many schools."] If it were done on behalf of the Roman Catholics, why could it not be done also on behalf of the Church schools?

LORD R. CECIL: How could they do it for 11,500 schools?

MR. RUNCIMAN: This does not apply to 11,500 schools. There are only 5,200 of these contracting-out Church schools. But I make no complaint. I only say if you are going to take a dipping sample of about 3 per cent. of the schools, you are not able to make a full and accurate statement of the position of the Church schools. The Archbishop was good enough to ask some of his experts to confer with us at the Board of Education, and go into the accounts of these schools. I refer to the 140 schools. We should have been glad to reconsider our grant if the case for these schools were substantiated, but it was not substantiated. Let me point out some of the discrepancies which came out during the discussion of these estimates. The Returns produced were not those of the actual annual expenditure, but were the estimate of managers of individual schools which on the face of them, were quite unreliable.

In the very first sheet that I examined I found among the items of annual expenditure a sum of £275 for rent. Rent is properly a capital charge, not a maintenance charge.

SIR HENRY CRAIK (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities): No.

MR. RUNCIMAN: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to know something about these charges.

SIR HENRY CRAIK: It is a maintenance charge.

MR. RUNCIMAN: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to proceed. It is a long time since the hon. Gentleman was at the Board of Education himself. I am giving the best possible information and giving it perfectly accurately. I say that rent is not recognised as a maintenance charge.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON: No.

MR. RUNCIMAN: It is impossible to get on with a running fire like this. Does the hon. Gentleman suggest that we ought to pay the rent of the voluntary schools?

SIR WILLIAM ANSON: I do not for a moment. But in the White Paper rent is put down as a charge of maintenance in the estimate of the general cost of the up-keep of council schools; and if rent is regarded as an element of maintenance in the case of council schools, it should be regarded as an element of maintenance in the case of the contracting-out schools also.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The local authorities who have administered the Act of 1902 have never regarded rent as a maintenance charge. Does the right hon. Gentleman suggest that every item which appears on the White Paper should be borne by the State? Of course not. I come now to the next item. It is said that when those schools in London which have been furnished by the London County Council contract-out, the County Council will withdraw the furniture and that they will have to be refurnished. Well, £300 for furniture was put down not for one year but as part of the annual expenditure of one of the schools. I am sure that no one will justify an item like that. There is an item for a football field. There is also a charge for school-attendance officers. They are paid for by the local authority. I found also a charge for medical inspection. That again is a charge which is borne not by the Church schools but by the local authority. I say it is impossible to accept estimates like these in support of a claim for larger grants from the Exchequer. They are not drawn up on a uniform basis; they contain optional as well as necessary expenditure; capital expenditure and maintenance expenditure; charges to be borne by the magistrates, charges to be borne by the local authorities; and the various items are so inextricably mixed up that it is impossible to accept the statement as a full and accurate presentation of the case of the Church schools.

MR. LYTTTELTON: I said I had no means of checking the returns in regard to those 140 schools. I mentioned that the Archbishop was so hurried that he could only get the figures in regard to these schools. What I ask the right hon. Gentleman to state now is what deduction from or addition to the 64s. 10d. per head he is prepared to make on the advice of his own experts?

MR. RUNCIMAN: When I have completed this part of my statement I shall be glad to answer the right hon. Gentleman. What I say is that estimates which are based on the accounts furnished by individual managers from all parts of the country, having no uniform principle running through them, are not sufficient to substantiate the case which has been put forward on behalf of the Archbishop. I do not blame the Archbishop, I do not blame the right hon. Gentleman. They relied on their experts, but I do think they have been badly advised, and I am quite sure that if their experts had dealt fairly with them they would not have made themselves responsible for statements such as those from which I have quoted this evening. The right hon. Gentleman relies on the White Paper. The right hon. Gentleman, if he had listened to the beginning of my speech, would know that we gave certain information from the local authorities—information that we had no right to demand and which some local authorities have refused to give—information in regard to some of the items. The item of 64s. 10d. is compared with 58s. 8d., but it is quite clear that the 64s. 10d. covers an entirely different set of items from those quoted by the right hon. Gentleman. You cannot add the cost of special subject classes scholarships, and there is no authority for knowing what the items cover. The right hon. Gentleman might throw up his hands, but where could we get the information? The local authorities decline to give it, and we cannot compel them to give it; they did not do it under his Bill; he had no statutory authority to require it. It is all very well to ask what is the use of the Board of Education; but the Board can only act on the authority it has under statute, and I think the right hon. Gentleman himself shared in the responsibility for the statute that set it up. I have given the basis on which we founded our calculation; there is nothing to conceal. We know the cost of the teaching staff, we have the power to find that out, and we have found it out. We know that the cost comes to £13,800,000, or an average of 52s. 3d. per child. It is high, and very largely because of the high salaries paid in London and the larger districts there is no cheap class of teachers. That is the amount, 52s. 3d. Now what other items fall on the cost of voluntary schools? There are fuel, lighting, cleaning, apparatus, books. Well, from all the information we can get under these heads I believe the cost works out at less than 8s. per child, that is to say, the total cost all over the country of Church schools that contract-out cannot exceed 60s. per child, and of Roman Catholic schools, 58s. 8d. Now what does that mean? The State actually under our contracting-out scheme provides five-sixths of the total up-keep of the schools, and we maintain that a sixth is not too large a proportion for the denomination to pay for the private management and private patronage they will enjoy. I might also say that on the other side we are giving a right of entry into county schools without charging a penny.

LORD R. CECIL: Our own schools.

MR. RUNCIMAN: I hope hon. Gentlemen will not put their claim too high. Is this proportion more than the Church of England can bear? Take the year 1901, the last year for which I have the figures, showing the amount of money coming from local sources towards Church schools. In that year the total grant amounted to, not 50s., but 35s. per child, and the amount coming from local resources to 10s. per child. We raised the grant subsequently to 47s., and then we raised it to 50s., so that with the grant we propose in this Bill we are making it possible for the Church schools to contract out without having to bear any greater burden than they had in 1901–2. The right hon. Gentleman may think we are cutting it rather fine, but that is not so, because that is on the assumption that every school will contract-out. The items do very nearly balance; but, as I was pointing out, there will be, under this Bill, a large number of Church schools which will be transferred. I am sure nobody will suggest for a moment that no Church schools will be transferred except in single-school districts. If that were so I should despair of any success coming to this Bill. If the Government had been under the impression that all the schools except in single-school areas were to contract-out we could not possibly have set our hands to this Bill. We have been told from the first by those who represent the Church of England that that Church looked forward to contracting-out being the exception and not the rule. If you are going to reduce that area, instead of having 5,200 schools outside, you will have 500 schools outside, and naturally the large sum of money which was at the disposal of the Church of England in 1901 would produce not 10s. per child but an enormously larger sum. If this Bill goes through, and the schools which are run now by the Church of England are to any considerable extent transferred, there is no reason why the Church of England schools should not be the most prosperous schools in England and Wales. It is quite possible that the subscriptions may have fallen in the interval, but they will have to cover a much smaller area than formerly, and I believe that those who hold so dearly to the principles of the Church of England are not likely to be less generous to the Church schools in 1909 than they were in 1901. One of the items which is missing from our Bill is a sliding scale for the future. I say quite frankly that we are prepared to put into the Schedule, if it is accepted in anything like a reasonable spirit, a Schedule which will provide that the contracted-out schools shall have a proportionate share in any increase above the grants under these proposals that may be made in Exchequer grants for the ordinary maintenance of public elementary schools. What I mean is this, we do not intend—and we would not like our successors—to give a larger Exchequer grant to local authority schools than to contracted-out schools, and if the Schedule does not provide for that elasticity we are prepared to revise it. I can only say that the Bill and Schedule actually fulfil what was undertaken by the Prime Minister. We have given a right—a real and effective right—of entry into the council schools, which many of our friends much dislike. We have also given those schools which think they must contract out a reasonable chance of existence. We have increased the amount of the grant by 3s. If we had adhered to the 47s. proposed by my hon. friend I am sure he could have made out a good case for that amount. But we have gone up by 3s. in order to meet hon. Gentlemen opposite and those who represent the Church. We believe that our offer, if it errs at all, errs on the side of liberality. With all the information at our disposal we are forced to the conclusion that to give a material or even a moderate increase would actually put a premium upon contracting out. I know it is not the intention of the Archbishop of Canterbury, nor do I believe it is the desire of any sound educationist in this country, definitely to encourage contracting out. I admit that, with all its drawbacks, it may be necessary as an exception; I do not think it necessary as a rule; and, indeed, if we were materially to increase the grant we should actually destroy the very basis upon which this Bill is founded.

*MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central) said that the President of the Board of Education had attempted to show a discrepancy between the figure of £120,000 a year quoted by the hon. Member for Waterford as the annual burden on Catholic schools and that of £215,000 quoted by the noble Lord the Member for Chichester. The two were perfectly reconcilable, the one being based on present expenditure while the other was an estimate of the future burden which the Bill would lay upon the schools. Now subsection (1) of Clause 3 laid it down that the contracted-out school must comply with all such conditions of efficiency, as regards teaching staff, school premises, and secular instruction as were required by the Board of Education in schools provided by the local education authority, and, therefore, the only basis on which they could argue this subject was the difference between the cost of maintenance in the provided schools and the amount of the grant offered them under the Bill. How were they to arrive at that difference? They could only start on the basis of the White Paper. He thought it a little hard that the President of the Board of Education should base his case on odd accounts sent up by private managers under great pressure, by singling out particular items where the accounts were badly made out, and that he should try to destroy their contentions on these figures when it was the business of the Government themselves to supply statistics on which alone the House could be expected to judge of the matter.

They must, however, go to the White Paper, and in reference to the figure of £215,000, that was based on the figure of the White Paper multiplied by the number of children in average attendance. He would like to take a smaller example for the sake of argument, and he would take the schools of the smallest religious community. In London there were some 5,700 children in average attendance in Jewish schools, and on the basis of the White Paper there would be a difference in round figures of 46s., which would appear to mean a charge on these schools of about £15,400 a year. What deductions were they to make from the White Paper? He invited the right hon. Gentleman to tell them tomorrow. In the case of these Jewish schools, a small number of schools all in the area of one local authority, these figures could be obtained as regarded London, and he thought that when they came to Clause 3 they ought to know what deductions were possible under the heads mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman from the figure of £15,400 which on the face of the White Paper would appear to be the sum which would have to be made up on the eight Jewish schools in London alone. To return to the figures of his own co-religionists, on the basis of the White Paper, the difference would come to £215,000. What deductions were they to make? He again invited the right hon. Gentleman to say. It could not be more than 4s. 10d. at the utmost, because under the right hon. Gentleman's own statement the 52s. plus the 8s. were chargeable in items which he himself admitted. He would make a very broad assumption for the sake of argument; he would say that these deductions might account for one-sixth of the difference. They thus got down to £179,000. Fees might have been charged in a very few schools before 1902, but he would make the assumption that £5,000 might possibly be raised in fees, and that got them down to £174,000. Then the right hon. Gentleman said that they would gain by the exclusion of scholars, which would get the schools on to a higher grant. They might gain infinitesimally per head, but they clearly would lose in the grant as a whole, and if economic laws held good with regard to the schools, the greater the bulk the cheaper the handling. Though they might, therefore, get a little more per child they would lose largely on the whole. With regard to pooling, he would not go into that, because it would in any case only be a slight shifting of the burden. Making every possible deduction, he put the future cost of these schools alone, on the present assured basis of expenditure, at £160,000 a year, exclusive of loan and administration charges. But, of course, there would be additions. In the first place, this 64s. 10d. was only an average, and in the second place the average varied, i.e., the 64s. 10d. was itself depressed by the fact that it included expenditure on voluntary schools, which had not come up to its natural level, because the increments of the teachers were only slowly, year by year, being earned. In London, the general expenditure was 94s. per child on the whole, but it was 99s. in the provided schools alone. Therefore, when the voluntary school teachers who were placed in the scale rose to their maximum the average would be 99s., instead of 94s., and the same thing was true of other towns. There must also be a large increase on administration. The handling of this very large though insufficient sum of money would require a large secretarial staff, and there would have to be auditors and branch officers in the provinces, and considerable travelling expenses. The administration charges generally were 3s. 5d. per child, but if he put them as low as 1s. per child that, in the case of these schools, would amount to £14,000 a year alone. They started with a minimum under the Bill of £160,000 certain, which must be increased by the items to which he had referred, and taking the possible deduction and setting against them the certain additions, he could not make out that the expenditure of these schools could be less than £190,000 a year, and shortly might be £210,000. How could a difference like that conceivably be met? How were they to deal with that situation? Were they to refuse the increments already promised to their teachers, or were they to dismiss them? What was said about the right hon. Gentleman about elasticity was meaningless. It did not provide against an increase in rate charges. All he said was that if an increased grant were to be made from the Exchequer some proportion would go to these schools in the future, but that did not meet the point that with a limited grant the schools which contracted out would be condemned to an ever-growing and uncertain expenditure. It put them in the cruel dilemma that they were necessarily made to look with suspicion on all educational progress that was costly. If this scheme of contracting out was carried through, there would be many loyal subjects up and down the country who would feel a sense of the gravest hardship and intolerable wrong.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON said that as he listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman he continually asked himself—Is this a settlement? His whole tone was one of vehement and almost angry criticism of the figures submitted—

MR. RUNCIMAN: I did nothing of the kind. I was trying to give the House as full information as possible.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON said he would withdraw the word angry, but he was surprised as he reminded himself that he was listening to a discussion on a settlement that he himself had honestly endeavoured to work in favour of, and in which the right hon. Gentleman had borne an honourable part, because the whole tone of the right hon. Gentleman was extremely critical of figures submitted to him under great difficulty by the Archbishop of Canterbury and his advisers. What was the situation? The right hon. Gentleman had been negotiating for this settlement for months. The essence of the transaction, as in most of these transactions, after all was the money consideration in the case of the schools which would not come in to the general system. It was proposed that the denominations should surrender their schools to the control of the local authority, that they should receive in return a right of entry which they had been discussing more or less imperfectly for a day and a half, and that certain schools where the children were of one faith, and which could not come conscientiously under this system, should be allowed to contract out on terms which it was hoped would keep them not below the educational level of the rest of the community. On what grounds did he complain that the Archbishop's figures were ineffective and unconvincing? He was not sure that they were, but what was the position? The Roman Catholic denomination had 800 schools to deal with; the Church of England had more than 11,000.

MR. RUNCIMAN: Only 5,200 Church schools can contract out.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON said that the whole cost of maintaining a voluntary school was surely an element of the calculation, and there were 11,000 voluntary schools in the country. In the estimate of the cost of maintaining a school all the schools were taken into consideration, and the schools which could not contract out were brought into the calculation. Under these circumstances it was not fair to say there were only 5,000 which would contract out when they used the other schools to lower the standard cost of maintenance. The right hon. Gentleman kept on alluding to one item after another and asking whether the Government was expected to pay this or that, as if the items submitted by the advisers of the Archbishop were items in a bill. They were nothing of the sort. They were estimates of the expenditure which would fall on a contracted-out school, and they could not keep up to the educational level of the rest of the community without a larger demand than the Schedule allowed upon the Parliamentary grant. After all, what figures had they to go upon? The right hon. Gentleman produced a certain number of figures which he said had been submitted to him, and considered by his experts, and which he believed to overthrow the calculations of the Archbishop; but what had they had to go upon except his own White Paper? What were the shadowy calculations which he said had been submitted to him, and which had been produced under great pressure during the last two or three days, compared with the elaborate and considered estimate in the White Paper? It was very difficult to upset those figures. They showed the steady march of education. He had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman was familiar with the Report of the Departmental Committee which sat in 1906. The estimates for the cost of maintenance in London, in county boroughs and urban districts, were there given, and the White Paper showed a small, but very legitimate advance made on the cost of education for every one of those areas. Therefore, they might take it that the statistics of the White Paper were absolutely reliable, because the figures very nearly corresponded, just differing sufficiently to show the ever increasing cost of education in the country. Therefore, he entirely declined, and he thought those who were advising the Archbishop in these negotiations were entitled to decline, to consider figures for which they had no authority whatever, except the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman that they had been considered in the course of the last few days at the Board of Education, as against the authoritative document which was before the House. The White Paper made out a charge of 64s. 10d. a child. The right hon. Gentleman said that a great deal of the cost would not fall upon the contracted-out schools. He really doubted whether he was justified in striking out classes for special subjects. There was a Parliamentary grant for the special subjects, and he presumed that the contracted-out schools would enjoy it, but he took it that the grant did not cover the whole cost, and that the local authority would make a charge upon the contracted-out school for the use of these classes corresponding to the expenditure out of the rates. Then with regard to scholarships. He did not understand also why contracting-out schools should not offer the same advantages to students in respect of scholarships as the local authorities' schools, nor why they should not estimate in their expenditure the scholarships that would be offered. The right hon. Gentleman had held up to ridicule the purchase of land, erection and enlargement, alteration and maintenance, of school buildings. If that was a fair charge to put down as an item in the maintenance of a council school, why was it to be unfair in the contracting-out schools? The contracted-out school would need to keep up its buildings, and from time to time to enlarge them just as much as the council schools, and those who had to bear the cost of the upkeep would also have to pay the rate which went towards the upkeep of the other schools in the county. Upkeep was an item which could not be left out of consideration nor could the cost of administration. It might very well be that the contracted-out schools would require officers to see to school attendance. If so, it was an item of cost in considering the financial position of the contracted-out schools. And when they came to the cost of administration the right hon. Gentleman forgot that he had put upon the Church of England the administration of, possibly, a couple of millions of money, which would have to be dealt with by apportionment to the contracted-out schools. Pooling, no doubt, did help where there was a great discrepancy in the case of one area as against another which was maintained at less cost, and which could help the one which was maintained at a greater cost. But he was afraid the contracted-out schools would always be found to be in areas of the same financial capacity, and that pooling would not be such an assistance as the right hon. Gentleman supposed. But, anyhow, the administration of this larger fund must be a considerable item of cost. That being so, they had the right hon. Gentleman's figures before them, which he would take as authoritative figures set forth in the White Paper, and they were not satisfied that the deductions which he proposed to make were justifiable. What was the upshot of the whole matter? How did they stand? The finance of the contracted-out school was really the essence of the transaction. The Roman Catholic schools had stated their own case. He was not prepared to be bound by the financial statement of the Roman Catholics. They might have their views as to the cost of maintenance and their own economy, which might not be that of other schools. At any rate, on the right hon. Gentleman's figures, it seemed to him that the Archbishop's contention that the grant must be increased by a sum of at least 6s. to make the financial position tolerable for the contracting-out schools was a minimum statement. He hoped that the financial question might be settled satisfactorily, but if it was not, he did not think that the fault would rest with the Opposition. The whole power of ascertaining the financial position of any school in the kingdom rested with the right hon. Gentleman. Under the Code he could get the figures of any school which he chose to ask for. He had had this matter before him for months. He had published a Paper, the figures of which they were prepared to accept. He disputed his own figures, and he disputed the Archbishop's figures, and under these circumstances he (Sir William Anson) was rather puzzled to know where they were, or what figures would satisfy the right hon. Gentleman as to the financial position of contracted-out schools. If he was a friend of the settlement he was a friend of contracting-out. If contracting-out, on the scale put forth in the Bill was the last word of the Government, he should feel it his duty to oppose the Bill. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman might yet find it possible to enable him to support him, as he had hitherto done, in effecting a settlement which he believed he had at heart, but if his speech to-night was the last word on the subject his hopes were sinking very low.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Captain Donelan and Mr.
 Patrick O'Brien.

Whereupon Mr. SPEAKER, in pursuance of the Order of the House of 31st July, put.

Adjourned at nineteen minutes before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, 3rd December, 1908.

PETITIONS.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Petition for Amendment of ; of school board of Kirkcaldy ; read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

RETURNS, REPORTS, ETC.

STATISTICS (FOREIGN COUNTRIES).

Statistical abstract for the principal and other foreign countries in each year from 1896 to 1905-1906 (as far as the particulars can be stated), with some provisional figures for 1907. Thirty-fourth Number.

RAILWAY SERVANTS (HOURS OF LABOUR).

Return in pursuance of Section 4 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1889, of railway servants of certain classes who were on one or more occasions during the month of July, 1908, on duty on certain railways of the United Kingdom for more than twelve hours at a time, or who, after being on duty more than twelve hours, were allowed to resume work with less than nine hours rest ; showing periods of duty after deduction of time (if any) spent in travelling home after relief and certain definite and continuous intervals of rest of four hours or upwards ; with appendices giving additional statements and explanations furnished by the railway companies.

Presented (by Command), and ordered to lie on the Table.

DISEASES OF ANIMALS ACTS, 1894 TO 1903.

Order No. 7619, dated 28th November, 1908, permitting the landing at a foreign animals wharf in Great Britain of animals carried on board the s.s. "Titian."

DESTRUCTIVE INSECTS AND PESTS ACTS, 1877 AND 1907.

Order, dated the 27th November, 1908, entitled the "American Gooseberry Mildew (Wisbech and District) Order of 1908."

Laid before the House (pursuant to Act), and ordered to lie on the Table.

VOL. CXC VII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

LAW OF DISTRESS AMENDMENT BILL.

Amendments reported (according to order).

LORD ATKINSON explained that the Amendments standing in his name on the Paper were really Lord Halsbury's Amendments, which he had undertaken to move on his noble and learned friend's behalf. He first moved to omit from paragraph (c) of Clause 1 the words "lease, under-lease, or." The paragraph would then read—

"Any other person whatsoever not being a tenant of the premises or of any part thereof, and not having any beneficial interest in any any tenancy of the premises or of any part thereof."

Amendment moved—

"In page 1, line 15, to leave out the words 'lease, under-lease, or.'"—(Lord Atkinson.)

LORD COURTNEY OF PENWITH accepted the Amendment.

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Drafting Amendment agreed to.

Drafting Amendments to Clause 3 agreed to.

LORD ATKINSON formally moved to omit from Clause 4 the provision that the Bill should not apply to goods of an under tenant (not being a lodger) who should have become a tenant of premises without the consent of the superior landlord contrary to any lease or agreement under which the immediate tenant held.

Amendment moved—

"In page 3, line 32, to leave out from the word 'Corporation' to the word 'Provided' in line 37."—(Lord Atkinson.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

LORD ATKINSON moved three Amendments to the proviso at the end of Clause 4, so as to make it read—

"Provided that it shall be competent for a stipendiary magistrate, or where there is no stipendiary magistrates for two justices, upon application by the superior landlord or any under tenant or other such person as aforesaid, upon hearing the parties, to determine whether any goods are in fact goods covered by subsection (2) of this section."

Drafting Amendments to Clause 5, agreed to.

LORD COURTNEY OF PENWITH, who had an Amendment on the Paper to leave out Clause 5, which ran—

“This Act shall not apply to any under tenant, not being a lodger, where the under tenancy has been created in breach of any covenant or agreement in writing between the landlord and his immediate tenant, or where the under tenancy has been created contrary to the wish of the landlord in that behalf, expressed in writing and delivered at the premises within a reasonable time after the circumstances have come, or with due diligence, would have come to his knowledge,” said that words had just been deleted from Clause 4, on the Motion of Lord Atkinson, to the omission of which he (Lord Courtney) ought to have objected; but he was under the impression that what the noble and learned Lord was moving was merely a drafting Amendment. He certainly thought his attention might have been called to the effect of the Amendment. As the words in question had been omitted from Clause 4, he had no option but to allow Clause 5 to stand. He would not, therefore, move his Amendment.

LORD AVEBURY said the words that have been struck out of Clause 4 were suggested by him in Committee, and were, he understood, assented to by the noble Lord in charge of the Bill. Lord Halsbury suggested other words which he thought would better carry out the object, and Clause 5 was the result. As Clause 5 was in the Bill he (Lord Avebury) did not object to the words in Clause 4 being deleted, and now that those words had disappeared Clause 5 was necessary.

LORD ATKINSON said his reason for moving the omission of the words in question from Clause 4 was that Clause 5 covered exactly the same point. He did not understand that the noble Lord in charge of the Bill preferred retaining the provision in Clause 4. Moreover, Lord Halsbury, for whom he was acting, attached the utmost importance to Clause 5, which contained more than was provided for by the words omitted from Clause 4.

LORD COURTNEY OF PENWITH said it was precisely these additional words in Clause 5 to which he objected.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR having called attention to the fact that there was no Amendment before the House,

The discussion on Clause 5 dropped.

LORD ATKINSON moved to amend Clause 6 so as to compel the under-tenant, if served with the required notice, to pay to the superior landlord not only the rent due but also the rent accruing.

Amendment moved—

“In page 4, line 18, after the word “rent” to insert the words “whether the same has already accrued due or not.”—(Lord Atkinson.)

LORD COURTNEY OF PENWITH accepted the Amendment.

On Question Amendment agreed to.

LORD ATKINSON said the Amendment standing in his name to Clause 8 was really, if their Lordships would forgive an Irishism, consequential upon an Amendment which had not yet been reached. Clause 10 provided that the Act should not apply to Scotland, and when that clause was reached he proposed to add words restricting the application of the Bill to Ireland to a rent issuing out of lands or tenements situate wholly within the boundaries of a municipality or of a township having town commissioners. The object was to remove agricultural tenancies from the operation of the Act. The noble Lord in charge of the Bill was prepared to accept those additional words when they came to Clause 10, and therefore he now moved to insert in Clause 8, which provided that the Lodgers' Goods Protection Act, 1871, should be repealed as from the commencement of this Act, the words "wherever and so far as this Act applies."

Amendment moved—

"In page 4, line 25, after the word 'shall' to insert the words 'wherever and so far as this Act applies.'"—(Lord Atkinson.)

LORD COURTNEY OF PENWITH accepted the Amendment.

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Drafting Amendment to Clause 9 agreed to.

LORD ATKINSON then moved to add to Clause 10 the provision to which he had referred, the practical effect of which, he said, would be to confine the Act to urban areas.

Amendment moved—

"In page 4, line 32, after the word 'Scotland' to insert the words 'and shall only apply in Ireland to a rent issuing out of lands or tenements situate wholly within the boundaries of a municipality or of a township having town commissioners.'"—(Lord Atkinson.)

On Question Amendment agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^a on Monday next, and to be printed as amended. (No. 37.)

INCEST BILL.

House in Committee (according to order): Bill reported without Amendment, and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

THE STRENGTH OF THE ARMY.

*THE EARL OF ERROLL: My Lords, I desire to call attention to a statement reported to have been made by the Secretary of State for War on Friday the 20th November, at Guildford, to the effect that, "the Army is 90,000 stronger than it was three years ago," and to ask for details justifying these figures; and to move for Papers.

What I want to know is whether these extra men—and I lay emphasis on the word extra—represent a net increase of the numbers of the Army, or do they merely represent a change of name and a re-arrangement of units, with the view of persuading the public that the armed strength of the country is greater than the facts justify? Do these men really exist in the flesh, or are they more in the nature of a stage Army, in which the same men are counted several times over? The right hon. Gentleman went on, in the speech to which I have alluded, to claim an increase of 65,000 men in the Special Reserve, and an increase of 40,000 in the reserve of the Regular Army. From this total of 105,000 men he deducted 15,000 as due to the reductions of nine battalions, leaving as the net increase 90,000 men. I venture to say that this calculation is erroneous and absolutely misleading, because it altogether ignores the Militia of three years ago. I maintain that in a comparative statement, if credit is taken for the Special Reserve now, credit should also be taken for the Militia as they existed in 1905. This is a debit and credit amount, and if you take credit for the Special Reserve you must take credit for the Militia as well. You must take credit for both or neither.

Now, what is the Special Reserve? It is merely the old Militia under a new name, with the obligation to serve abroad. At the present moment it is 25,000 men short of what the Militia was in 1905, and it has an annual training of fourteen days instead of twenty-eight days as in the case of the old Militia. In what I may call the pre-territorial days, it was the established custom when calculating the armed strength of the country to include the Militia, and I am informed that the War Office used always to rely on two-thirds of the Militia volunteering for service abroad. Granted that this obligation of the Special Reserve to serve abroad is a good one, which I am quite ready to admit, I maintain that that is no reason why all the value of the Militia of three years ago should be ignored. The Militia never failed to come forward when asked. They fought in very large numbers in the Peninsula, they were present in force at Waterloo, and during the Crimea they occupied the garrisons in the Mediterranean, and their services in South Africa are so recent that I need not allude to them.

The Militia establishment in 1905 was 130,000 men and their actual strength, irrespective of the permanent staff, was 90,000. The Special Reserve establishment is 80,000—its present strength is, I believe, somewhere near 65,000—so that, even if it were up to its total establishment, it would still be 10,000 below the Militia of three years ago. Even supposing that the organisation is better, I maintain that you cannot, by wiping out 90,000 men and replacing them by 65,000, claim to have increased the numbers. Really we are in a worse position now than we were three years ago. With 75,000 fewer men in the Territorial Army than we had in the Yeomanry and Volunteer Forces, 20,000 less men in the Regular services, and the balance of loss of 25,000 between the Militia and the Special Reserve, there are, deducting the increase in the Reserve of the Regular Army, 80,000 less men to call upon than there were three years ago.

Speaking in the City the other night, Mr. Haldane is reported to have said—

“There was no greater fallacy than to suppose that the Government had reduced the Regular Line. They had far more than compensated for any changes by providing the Special Reserve.”

To me this is a most astounding statement. It was the Militia who were replaced by the Special Reserve. The Regulars who have been done away with have never been replaced at all.

A word as to the organisation of the Special Reserve. It consists of so-called units of 550 men, with an annual training of fourteen days; it is to feed the Line, and is composed of very young men. I am told that not 50 per cent. of the men, after feeding the Line, would be fit, through age and physical defects, to take part in a campaign. Further, it would be impossible now for the Special Reserve to garrison Mediterranean and other ports and so free the Regular battalions there. The Special Reserve will have to remain at home as a depot, to train men to fill up the Army in the field. Then I come to the Expeditionary Force. It is claimed that the Expeditionary Force, which should be ready to go out of the country almost at once, consists of 160,000 men, and that the Army Reserve is now 140,000. I think this would convey to the non-military mind that we had 160,000 men plus 140,000 men. But it is nothing of the sort. Before mobilising this Expeditionary Force all these Reserves would be swallowed up. I am informed that two Divisions or the equivalent of 30,000 men, would be sent to India. We should then want 100,000 to fill the ranks—that is, two reserve men to every man serving. For the Expeditionary Force the numbers are 169,000. The regiments that we have at home would, I believe, supply—that is to say, they have in their ranks now—120,000 men; but when you deduct the recruits, the unfit, and those under age you get a number something like 50,000. That leaves us in this country with only about 70,000 towards the Expeditionary Force and we should have to take 100,000 men from the Reserve to make up the Expeditionary Force. I believe the Army Council calculate that to replace casualties during the first six months we should want another 60,000 men, so that by that time we should have used up not only our Regular Army Reserve, but what is left of the Special Reserve as well.

Then I come to the Army Reserve of 140,000 men. I am quite willing to admit that that is an advance on what we have had, but those figures at the present moment are abnormal. They are not due to the Government scheme, but to temporary causes, and particularly due to the three years system established by Lord Middleton, but when these men begin to leave the Reserve, the numbers must go down, because their places will not be filled up, as their Reserve producing units have been destroyed, and I think that the normal Reserve will be much over 100,000 or 110,000 men. Before the war we had an Army Reserve of 80,000, and a Militia Reserve of 30,000 men, so that when the present exceptional circumstances cease to prevail the Reserve will come to be about what it was before the war. It is, therefore, absurd to say that the Army has been reduced. From what I can see the exact contrary is the case. You cannot increase your numbers by simply changing a name. By improved organisation and an alteration in the terms of service you may increase efficiency, but that does not give you more men. Whether the men are called the First or Second Line does not affect the total number available. In my view, such statements as the one to which I have referred are dangerous and give to the country a false idea of our military strength.

Moved, that an humble Address be presented to His Majesty for Papers relating to a statement reported to have been made by the Secretary of State for War on Friday the 20th November, at Guildford, to the effect "that the Army was 90,000 stronger than it was three years ago."—(The Earl of Erroll.)

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Lord LUCAS): My Lords, the speech of the Secretary of State for War at Guildford, to which the noble Lord has referred, was very inadequately reported in The Times. If the noble Earl had referred to fuller reports, he would have seen that Mr. Haldane was speaking entirely about the Regular Army. The noble Earl based his argument on what he has himself described as the condition of the armed forces. The position with regard to the Regular Army is exactly as stated by the Secretary of State. If you count, as you are bound to do, the numbers available on mobilisation and the Reserve, you will find that there is a large increase.

The increase has been obtained in this way. In the first place, we do not wish to take any credit to ourselves for the abnormal condition of the Regular Reserve. Its condition is entirely due to the action of the noble Viscount opposite (Lord Midleton). The three years system which the noble Viscount established, and the number of men who came in as three years men have increased the Reserve very much above the normal figure. It is 40,000 higher than in 1905, and about 14,000 or 15,000 higher than it will be when it gets back to what I may call its normal condition—that is to say, when the present terms of enlistment have been worked sufficiently long for the three years men to have all passed out of the Reserve. I do not wish to deny that it has been of great advantage to have had these 40,000 men. They have given a strength to the force which came in very opportunely to help us through the period of organisation. As gradually the new system comes into full operation the Special Reserve will, we hope, be up to its full establishment, the number of men serving with the Colours will be older and larger, and therefore we shall have to make much less call on the Reserve on mobilisation than we should have to do at present.

Next you have to consider the other category of Reserve—the Special Reserve. After passing the Act of last year you cannot help yourselves from considering the Special Reserve as a part of the First Line. It is true, as the noble Earl has said, that the Militia have always come forward very patriotically on the occasions when they have been called upon, and they have gone out in their units to the various big wars in which this country has been engaged. At the time of the South African War there was a Militia Reserve of 30,000 men, and without that Reserve it is hard to say what would have been done to find the necessary reinforcements for the Regular Army. But soon after the war the Militia Reserve, as the noble Earl will remember, was abolished, and some means had to be found to obtain drafts for the units of the First Line of the Regular Army outside the Army itself. The only way to obtain these was from the Militia, but the Militia, as we all know, were unwilling to undertake that function, and it was only after considerable difficulty that they did undertake it, and they have now come into the Special Reserve. Had you not had that re organisation, had you left things as they were when the present Government came into office, you would have had practically nothing to fall back upon for the supply of drafts and to fill up wastage of war in the Regular Army. You have provided that by the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, and I cannot conceive how it can be argued that those forces are not to be regarded as strengthening to that degree the Regular Army. I maintain that they are an important source of strength to the Regular Army.

When you talk about a profit and loss account you are again arguing from the point of view of the general armed forces of the Crown. Mr. Haldane carefully stated in his speech that he was only dealing with the Regular Army. It is quite true that the forces outside the Regular Army are proportionately less. What we claim is that by reorganisation and by more carefully and scientifically defining the functions of the various parts of the Regular Army it is possible to make it a more powerful and more efficient weapon with which to fulfil its duties. You still have the Militia in the present Special Reserve. You do not require more than a certain number of them on mobilisation; but on mobilisation you at once embody your Special Reserve units, and put into them not only the whole of the Special Reserve but also the surplus Regulars. There will be a certain number of surplus Reservists and a certain number of soldiers who for various reasons, being too young and so on, do not go abroad in case of war. They are formed into battalions. At present, if you had to mobilise the Army you would have seventy-four of these battalions, with a large proportion of Regular officers, who would be as capable of fulfilling duties for the defence of this country as the Militia would have been. They are not, of course, mobile troops, but you can usefully use them to release mobile troops for other purposes.

Then as regards the question of garrisoning stations in the Mediterranean and elsewhere to release Regular battalions. Besides the seventy-four battalions to which I have referred, who constitute the training machinery of your drafts, you have twenty-seven other battalions who will be used for that sort of purpose—for the same work, in fact, as the Militia did before. You are not going to call upon them to supply drafts; they are outside your drafting machinery. They are the fourth battalions, and will be used in the way I have suggested. At the early stage of the campaign, therefore, and before the Territorial Army has received its war training, you have these battalions of the Special Reserve who are more efficient from the military point of view than the old Militia, and are able to fulfil the duties that the Militia could have carried out.

*THE EARL OF ERROLL: Did I understand the noble Lord to say that the Special Reserve units were fit to take the place of the Militia in garrisoning stations in the Mediterranean and elsewhere?

*LORD LUCAS: Yes. You have seventy-four third battalions, who constitute the actual machinery for training drafts. Besides those, you have twenty-seven fourth battalions, which are not to provide drafts, but are to be used for garrisoning the stations in the Mediterranean and for similar purposes. As to the 90,000, there is an increase of 40,000 men of the Regular Reserve, and 65,000—now nearer 68,000—of the Special Reserve, and against that, you have to put the reductions made in the Regular Army of 18,000 men. The reductions in the Regular Army consist partly of those troops considered to be no longer required owing to certain changes in defensive policy.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON: Will the noble Lord state the nature of those troops?

*LORD LUCAS: The chief reductions are set out in the Return recently presented to your Lordship's House. The reductions consist chiefly of garrison artillery, which has been reduced by some 5,000 since 1905, and there is a reduction also in fortress engineers. By the reductions of these men the expeditionary force is not affected in any way. The reduction of certain infantry battalions has only taken place because they were surplus to any force you could possibly have organised and put into the field as an organised body. In spite of the reductions, we can at the present time mobilise a larger organised expeditionary force than was ever possible before, and now that the establishment is rapidly filling up, especially in the weak arms, we shall be able to mobilise an expeditionary force of over 160,000. There is at present, as I have said, an increase of 40,000 in the Regular Reserve and 68,000 in the Special Reserve, and if you allow 18,000 for reductions that brings the total increase to 90,000. As to the question of age, the number of men under twenty in the Special Reserve on October 1st was just over 16,000, which compares very favourably with the number under twenty in the Militia in 1905—the number was then 23,000.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON: My Lords, as we recently had a debate on the whole subject of our military strength I shall confine myself on the present occasion entirely to the point raised by the noble Earl, which is whether the Secretary of State for War is justified in going about the country stating that the Regular Army is now 90,000 stronger than it was two or three years ago. I submit that the argument which the noble Earl employed has not been answered in the smallest degree by the reply we have just had from the Under-Secretary. The noble Lord introduced a number of qualifications which, if they were all reported and were carefully weighed, would tend to remove from the minds of men a large percentage—perhaps 95 per cent.—of the value of the statement made by the Secretary of State. I would point out the extreme danger of such statements being made without those qualifications. I have in my hand a verbatim report of the speech of the Secretary of State, and this is the sort of statement I find in it—

“I have to state that, so far from the Regular Army having been cut down, we are to-day 90,000 stronger than we were three years ago; and yet the Army costs two and a half millions less.”

I believe the first statement is a delusion, and the second I hold to be absolutely incorrect. I challenge the noble Lord the Under-Secretary to substantiate it in a single particular.

*LORD LUCAS: If the noble Viscount will add the amount formerly spent annually in connection with military works loans, he will find the reduction in cost nearly twice as great.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON: Of course, if you give up a barrack programme and do not build the barracks necessary properly to house the troops you reduce expenditure, but it cannot properly be taken as a reduction on the cost of the Army. I speak with some indignation on this subject, because it is far too serious a one to be treated simply as a bone of contention across the floor of the House. The Secretary of State should have told his audience that a large part of the force to which he was referring was temporary and disappearing, owing to a long service system having been adopted as opposed to the short service system partially adopted by Lord Lansdowne, very much extended by his successor, and for which Mr. Arnold Forster intended to substitute a still shorter term which would have given an even larger Reserve. Mr. Haldane declared that it was a fallacy to suppose that an Army consisted only of people with the Colours, and he went on to compare our Reserve and this increase of strength with the Army of Germany. But the German Reserve is a Regular Reserve. What Mr. Haldane is asking the people of this country to believe is that the Reserve on which he is going to depend is also a Regular Reserve, whereas it is only a Reserve consisting of the old Militia under another name.

There is another point. The Secretary of State went on to justify himself for having reduced certain battalions. He said—

“We got rid of units which could be of no service. We considered what made for fighting efficiency. We found a very large surplus of infantry, and we reduced them in proper proportion to other arms.”

Units which could be of no service! He was referring to five battalions of Regular Infantry and one of Guards. Those battalions were raised under the last Administration. We had authority for it in the repeated demands of the Duke of Cambridge, of Lord Wolseley, of Lord Roberts, of Sir Redvers Buller, of Sir Evelyn Wood, and all the officers who served with them. Will the noble Lord tell me that any officer will declare that these battalions were surplus to our fighting efficiency?

LORD LUCAS: I can certainly say that, for the purpose of general military usefulness, the replacing of those infantry battalions by what is infinitely more required—artillery, of which the Army was ridiculously short—is of the utmost value.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON: The noble Lord said that these battalions were surplus to any force we could possibly put into the field. Will any one of his military advisers at the War Office tell him that when the expeditionary force had been sent abroad and we were mobilising for home defence, these infantry battalions would be surplus to our requirements?

LORD LUCAS: As an organised force, certainly. There is no organisation into which we could fit them. They are outside any possible organisation.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON: Therefore, if a foreign force lands to-morrow—and it is admitted that that is not without the bounds of possibility—the War Office, according to the Under-Secretary, prefer to meet the invading force with a Territorial Army and without the support of these five battalions of Regulars and this battalion of Guards. The noble Lord had better not advance such an argument, because it is impossible to maintain it, and the experience of all soldiers is against it. I have made these few remarks simply because I feel that the utterances of the Secretary of State are calculated to mislead the public. If they are not so intended, they ought to be withdrawn or modified. The effect of them can only be to pile up against the Secretary of State in the future the whole military opinion of all those who are now complaining of the undue reduction of our Regular Army. Even when the Secretary of State has got his Special Reserve to the full he will have a force which his soldiers will turn round and tell him they cannot depend on without more Regulars. I will add this assertion, that, even if the Secretary of State's statement is accepted as correct, he has not got the officers for the 90,000 men, and could not mobilise them to-morrow. What I would urge is that we might be allowed in future to gain the advantage on our side that we have endeavoured to give to the noble Lord. Not a word has fallen from this bench in criticism of the present condition of the Territorial Army, although we know its organisation is far from complete, because we believe that time should be given for the experiment and because we desire that everybody should lend a hand to make the experiment a success. But, in the meantime, I would urge that what I venture to call these vain-glorious boasts as to the condition of the Army, boasts which we know to have no military support whatever at their back, should be discontinued, and that the modifications which the Under-Secretary has to-night introduced into Mr. Haldane's speech should, on the first available opportunity, be made equally clear with the utterance of the Secretary of State of which we complain.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of CREWE): My

Viscount M. d'...

Lords, I do not propose to enter into the technical part of this debate, the War Office reply having already been given by my noble friend behind me. I merely desire to make one or two observations upon what was said by the noble Viscount who has just sat down. The noble Viscount took credit to himself and his friends on the benches opposite that they had not in any way attacked the organisation of the Territorial Army. With all respect to the noble Viscount that really is not the case. The debate which was initiated the other night by the noble and gallant Field-Marshal who is not now in his place, though not an attack on the Territorial Army, amounted to a categorical statement that the whole scheme of the Territorial Army was absolutely ineffective for the purpose for which it was designed and a demand for the establishment of an entirely different system; and noble Lords opposite trooped into the lobby with the noble and gallant Field-Marshal. To say after that that no attack has been made on the organisation of the Territorial Army because noble Lords have not mentioned what has happened in this country or that is not, it appears to me, entirely in accordance with the facts. After that debate we are, unfortunately, obliged to regard noble Lords opposite as wedded to some new, and, I confess, unexplained system of organisation of the forces of this country, and it was in the hope that we might avoid that conclusion that we besought noble Lords not to join the noble and gallant Field-Marshal in the lobby on that occasion. The noble Viscount objected to the inclusion of interest on loans in calculating the annual expenses of the Army because, he said, those loans were for all time. But, unfortunately, that is not so. The complaint was that a very large proportion of the money raised in that way was used for purposes not merely temporary, but which the experience of a few years showed to be useless. Therefore, I am afraid that from the taxpayers' point of view—and that is the only point of view which, when you come to speak of expenditure, matters—the money spent by way of loan must be counted in as much as the ordinary expenses of the Army.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON: The noble Earl, I think, is ignoring the fact that all money raised on loan is being paid off by an annual charge over a short period of years. They are already bearing on their Estimates the cost of all loans of the last twenty years, many of which are reaching maturity.

THE EARL OF CREWE: We are, unfortunately for ourselves, suffering for the loans raised by the Government of noble Lords opposite. We are still paying for things that have proved, in more than one case, to be useless for the purpose for which they were designed. All the previous speakers pointed, with perfect truth, to the fact that a very considerable portion of the surplus of men to which my right hon. friend alluded is due to the exceptional swelling of the Reserve owing to the initiation and the abandonment of the three years service of the noble Viscount. I really think that, if I were the noble Viscount, I would talk as little as possible about the three years system, because I suppose it is common knowledge that that system had to be abandoned in a great hurry owing to the discovery being made that if it had been continued we should very soon have been without an Army or Reserve at all. We have no complaint whatever to make of this debate having been raised. I think it is a perfectly arguable point to say that my right hon. friend overstated his case, if noble Lords will have it so, in including the Special Reserve in the Army; but my right hon. friend does take up that position. He does differentiate between the position of that portion of the Militia which has been replaced by the Special Reserve and the Special Reserve itself, and there are perfectly sound reasons for doing so. It is, no doubt, the fact, as the noble Viscount stated, that the training in that case is not to the same extent as the Regular Army, but you must regard the Special Reserve now as forming part of the Regular Army, and I think my right hon. friend was quite justified in including it in his figures.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, I am afraid we shall find ourselves wandering away from the point into a somewhat general discussion upon a number of interesting military questions. For example, I do not think the question of the policy of providing barracks by means of loans of greater or less duration is quite before us this evening. Nor, again, are we much concerned to-night with the Motion which was brought on the other evening by the noble and gallant Field-Marshal. I think by the way the noble Earl did Lord Roberts rather an injustice in representing him as having attacked the Territorial system. Lord Roberts, whenever I have had the pleasure of listening to him, has always gone out of his way to applaud Mr. Haldane's Territorial system; but it is quite true that he has added to that an expression of his belief that that system, as at present instituted, will fail to give us anything like the number of men that are required.

THE EARL OF CREWE: I never accused Lord Roberts of having attacked the Territorial system, because, as we all know, he has expressed a general approval of it; but he has so far attacked the whole policy of my right hon. friend as to say that he considered the provision of men for the Home Army to be entirely inadequate.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I rather think the noble Earl did use the word "attack" in connection with Lord Roberts' speech; this evening, however, the only point really before us is the very specific and well-defined point raised by my noble friend on the back Bench. He challenged the accuracy of Mr. Haldane's statement in his Guildford speech, and the noble Lord who so well represents the War Office made a very interesting attempt to justify Mr. Haldane's conclusion. He gave us a profit and loss account—I think that was the expression he used—or a statement of the manner in which the War Office regarded the profit and loss account, the profit being the number of men added to the Army by recent changes and the loss being the loss sustained in men and officers owing to the breaking up of old units. These statistics are not always very easy to handle or to follow, and I confess I do not think the noble Lord was entirely successful in bringing out the total profit claimed by Mr. Haldane at Guildford. The only point that I did, I think, gather clearly from the noble Lord was that whilst we are not at liberty to count amongst the Regular Army the Militia as we used to know it, noble Lords opposite do think themselves entitled to count in the Regular Army the Special Reservists, who, my noble friend maintains, are the Militia under a different name. But I really rose for the purpose of making a humble suggestion which I think may, perhaps, be helpful. Would it not be possible for the noble Lord to lay on the Table in the simplest and most intelligible form a statement of the profit and loss account on which he relies?

VISCOUNT MIDLETON: And the cost.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My noble friend suggests that to that might be added a statement of the cost under the old and under the new system. We have before us an interesting Return, moved for by my noble friend, and I was looking at it whilst the noble Lord opposite was speaking; but I am bound to say that I could not work it out so as to show the credit balance which the Under-Secretary so confidently claims. I hope, therefore, the noble Lord will consider whether he can give us the calculation on which he relies.

THE EARL OF ERROLL: If the profit and loss account is laid on the Table, I hope it will include the whole armed strength of the country now and three years ago.

LORD LUCAS: I really think the Paper which has been laid before Parliament at the instance of the noble Viscount contains all the information that has been asked for. It contains the difference in strength and in establishment between the Regular Army now and in 1905; it contains also a comparison between the Militia in 1905 and the Special Reserve now, and the Volunteers in 1905 and the Territorial Army now; and, finally there is a statement on the last page as to the Reserves in 1905 and now. I should have thought that that gave all the information asked for. If, however, noble Lords will specify particular points concerning which they desire additional information, I will see whether the Return can be amplified in order to meet their wishes.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

THE EARL OF ONSLOW rose to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture the following Questions: (1) whether the Local Government Board and the Public Works Loan Commissioners will lend money for the full periods fixed for loans under the Small Holdings Acts and whether the President of the Board of Agriculture will say under what authority a refusal to lend for such full period is based; (2) whether it is the intention of the Local Government Board to subject proposals of a county council to the examination of the officials of that Department, as well as of the Board of Agriculture, before granting sanction to a loan, thereby considerably increasing the cost of the land to the small holder; (3) whether, if any part of the sinking fund to repay the cost of the purchase of a small holding is borne by the county rate instead of by the small holding tenant, and the scheme results in a loss, the Treasury will refuse to bear any part of such loss; (4) in cases where a council takes on lease, either by agreement or compulsorily, land with a prospective but not immediate building value, subject to the rights of resumption under Clause 33 of the Small Holdings Act, 1907, what time would be granted for a loan for the erection of buildings and houses thereon; also whether the compensation for unexhausted improvements effected by the tenant, which will be useless to the person using such land for building purposes, must fall on the county rate; (5) whether the Board will sanction the addition of 5 per cent. on land, 10 per cent. on buildings, and 12 per cent. on dwelling-houses to the rental of small holdings, for repairs and management, or what percentage meets with the approval of the Board; (6) whether in the event of the breach by one of the sub-tenants of a county council of the covenants of a lease, the penalty for which was re-entry, the landlord would be entitled also to resume possession of the land occupied by the other sub-tenants; (7) whether, in the opinion of the Board, the occupation of a piece of grass land provided as a small holding by a county council for the purpose of grazing a pony or cows is a compliance with the provision of Section 6 of the Act of 1907, that a small holder must himself cultivate the holding; (8) whether in cases where farm labourers apply to be put in the position of small holders instead of farm labourers, but are called on to vacate their cottages to make room for their successors as labourers on the farm, the county council should erect new cottages for them, or may acquire their present cottages either by agreement or under compulsion; (9) whether, in the opinion of the Board, it is the duty of a county borough to provide land for small holders outside the county, if they cannot do so within, for persons who will thus cease to be county ratepayers; (10) whether the Board of Agriculture will fix a date at which it will notify to councils in whose counties there remains an unsatisfied demand for small holdings the date by which, in the opinion of the Board, such demand should be satisfied, and in default of which it will be the duty of the Board to prepare a scheme; and, if so, what notice will be given of the intention to fix such a date; (11) whether, in the opinion of the Board of Agriculture, in cases where in any district there are only moderate sized holdings of about 100 acres held mainly in connection with rural industries, a county council should entertain applications to have them broken up for holdings of 50 acres or under; and (12) whether the President of the Board of Agriculture will take note of the many and serious difficulties which have arisen in the administration of the Acts, and institute an inquiry thereon with a view to the introduction of an amending Bill to overcome them.

The noble Earl said: My Lords, I think I owe an apology to your Lordships for the length of the Questions which appear in my name on the Paper, but I am not going to dwell at any length upon them. I wish to refer only to two of them—the first and the third Questions, which deal with the length of time which will be allowed for the repayment of loans on houses and buildings. A period of eighty years is allowed in the case of land, and, of course, the small sum necessary to be set aside as a sinking fund is not a serious item in the rent; but when you come to the question of buildings and houses, instead of eighty years, you are cut down to thirty years, and in some cases, I am told, to under fifteen years, which makes a serious difference to the small holder in the rent he has to pay. For your Lordships must recollect that the small holder is required not only to pay the rent for the land which he hires and the interest on the cost of the buildings, but also to pay off the loan on the land and buildings within a certain number of years; that is to say, at the end of that period the county council becomes the happy possessor of the land, houses, and buildings for nothing. To show how great a difference the term of repayment may make, I would like to take a few concrete cases within my own knowledge. The first case is that of buildings about to be put up at a cost of £800. If eighty years were allowed, the annual charge would be £30, but if only thirty years were allowed, the annual charge would be £44, which, over a holding of 145 acres, would amount to an additional rent of 2s. per acre. The second case is that of a farm of 115 acres where £350 has to be spent on buildings. In this case the difference between eighty and thirty years would be not less than 1s. per acre. I also have a third case where the difference would be 1s. 6d. per acre. Surely there is no necessity to fix so short a period as thirty years. I think county councils may be relied upon to see that the buildings are kept in proper order and in substantial repair. As to the other Questions on the Paper, some of them have been answered to individual county councils, but I thought it would be of great assistance to all who are administering the Act if the Answers could be more generally known. Others were addressed to the noble Earl on the occasion of a conference which he summoned of representatives of county councils of England and Wales on the subject of the administration of the Small Holdings Act. That conference lasted some time. A full Report of the proceedings is on the Table, but I have looked through the Report in vain to find what answers were returned to those Questions. The proceedings seem to have been interrupted by the well-known hospitality of my noble friend the President of the Board of Agriculture, which has been one of his characteristics ever since he first entered public life. The whole of the conference were taken off to an excellent luncheon. They, no doubt, returned replete with the comforts of this life, but very empty-handed as regarded the questions which they addressed to the noble Earl. I thought, therefore, that the noble Earl would acquit me of any desire to hamper his Department if, for the information of those genuinely interested in small holdings, I gave him this opportunity of replying to the Questions that he did not answer on the occasion to which I have referred.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE AND FISHERIES (Earl CARRINGTON): My Lords, in reply to the first Question I have to say that the Board of Agriculture have been in communication with the Local Government Board on the subject, and it has been agreed between us that the Local Government Board, when so requested by the county councils, in the case of the purchase of land for small holdings, will grant loans for the full period of eighty years; and, as regards buildings, whether purchased with land or erected by councils, they will grant further loans for whatsoever period is justified by the character and probable life of the buildings up to the maximum of fifty years allowed by the Act. In the case of buildings erected upon land leased by the councils, of course the term of the loan will not exceed that of the lease, except where the lease provides that compensation is payable by the landlord for the buildings on the termination of the lease. The Board of Agriculture are so far quite satisfied with the arrangement. We have got a very good working arrangement, and I think there need be no fear that we have come to a very

Then the noble Earl asks whether it is the intention of the Local Government Board to subject proposals of a county council to the examination of the officials of that Department, as well as of the Board of Agriculture, before granting sanction to a loan. Of course, if the Local Government Board did that in every case it would be what is called an intolerable strain; but the Local Government Board have stated that in ordinary cases they do not think it necessary to hold an inquiry on their own account. Hence I do not think it need be anticipated that any examination of a case which they may make will really increase the cost of land to the small holder.

The Answer to the third Question—whether, if any part of the sinking fund to repay the cost of the purchase of a small holding is borne by the county rate instead of by the small holding tenant, and the scheme results in a loss, the Treasury will refuse to bear any part of such loss—is in the negative. They will not refuse to do so; but the Treasury Minute requires that the Board should certify that a council had used their best endeavours to obtain rent at the amounts necessary to recoup all the council's expenses. In view of the terms on which money can be borrowed under the Act, there really is no hardship on the councils. I honestly think that, under the new regime, people will be able to get small pieces of land, generally speaking, at lower rents than they could do formerly when from £8 to £20 an acre has been charged to these poor people for land for which farmers used to pay from 15s. to 20s. an acre.

As to the fourth Question, in some cases it would be possible, but in many cases that must be recognised as impracticable. In reply to the fifth Question, 15 per cent. would be about fair for all repairs, management, insurance, etc., where there are houses and buildings; and where there are no houses or buildings we think that about 7½ per cent. might probably be required. Question No. 6 is a legal conundrum, and I do not think I need go into it deeply. I am told that certain sections of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Acts, 1881 and 1892, which deal with rights of re-entry and forfeiture of leases, meet this difficulty. I do not profess to understand it, but that is the legal answer. The Answer to the seventh Question is: Yes. It is immaterial whether the land is used for grazing a cow or a pony. The Circular of 26th May, 1908, disposed entirely of that question.

The noble Earl next inquires whether in cases where farm labourers apply to be put in the position of small holders instead of farm labourers, but are called on to vacate their cottages to make room for their successors as labourers on the farm, the county council should erect new cottages for them, or may acquire their present cottages either by agreement or under compulsion. The Answer is that where a council desires to house applicants for small holdings they may either erect new cottages or purchase existing ones; but as a general rule, there would be difficulties in the way of compulsory hiring. Of course, the question of turning labourers out of their cottages is very much to be deplored. I may, perhaps, call the attention of the noble Earl to the case of Ireland — people seem much more favoured there than in this country. Under the Labourers' Cottages (Ireland) Act, where the accommodation is deficient or unfit, labourers have to be supplied by the district council with houses.

The point dealt with in Question No. 9 is practically the London problem—the problem of the urban boroughs, where it is the duty to provide land for small holdings outside the county. That is the great question of London, which is under consideration, and perhaps the noble Earl will forgive me if I do not go deeply into it to-night. Next, the noble Earl asks whether the Board of Agriculture will fix a date at which it will notify to councils in whose counties there remains an unsatisfied demand for small holdings the date by which, in the opinion of the Board, such demand should be satisfied, and in default of which it will be the duty of the Board to prepare a scheme. There is a great deal to be said for this suggestion. Under the Act six months is put as a limit, but I do not honestly think that the time has yet come to accept the suggestion. Speaking generally, I think county councils are endeavouring, to the best of their ability, to meet the Act. The Act requires that if the Board are of opinion that a scheme should be brought forward in any particular county, and if they inform the council accordingly, they are allowed six months to prepare a scheme before the Board can act in default.

The answer to the question whether, in the opinion of the Board of Agriculture, in cases where in any district there are only moderate-sized holdings of about 100 acres held mainly in connection with rural industries, a county council should entertain applications to have them broken up for holdings of fifty acres or under, is to be found in the account of the Conference to which the noble Earl has referred. It is impossible for the Board to give an answer to hypothetical cases of this sort. The county councils are, after all, reasonable men, and they can be trusted to act in a reasonable manner. I do not think it is very likely that in ordinary circumstances such a state of things should arise. Of course, if it is necessary, those men who hold 100 acres must give up the land, but, generally, some other and better arrangements can be made.

As to the last question, I do not think I can admit that the difficulties are either numerous or very serious. The administration of the Act is difficult, and the principal difficulty is, of course, the very large demand which has been disclosed from suitable men. We are overwhelmed with the demand for land, which used to be denied, but which I think now is generally accepted. Every officer in my Department is working double time to meet the demand, and the Treasury have told me that they will be generous in giving me as much more assistance as I may reasonably require. I think that, on the whole, though some people are a little bit disappointed that we have not gone still faster than we have, the Act is working extremely well, and I should be very much disappointed if, by next Michaelmas, we have not 100,000 acres in this country under small holdings. I do not think that an inquiry into the Act at the present moment would serve any useful purpose, and I respectfully ask that I may have a little more breathing time, say, till next Michaelmas, to see what progress has been made then.

LORD MONK-BRETTON: My Lords, the other day I asked the noble Lord who represents the Local Government Board in this House several questions with regard to the terms for the repayment of loans for the purposes of this Act, and I received categorical answers. I also called attention at the time to the fact that the statement which was then made by Lord Allendale, on behalf of the Local Government Board, differed entirely from that contained in a letter on the same subject which several local authorities had received from the Local Government Board. A month has elapsed since I called attention to the matter, and the local authorities are in precisely the same position as they were then. The county councils have received different answers from the Local Government Board with regard to the terms of the loan from those stated in this House, and I suggest that it might be practicable to issue regulations or a circular to the county councils explaining exactly what is the position, so that they may be able to proceed with the Act. As things are, county councils are being hardly treated in this matter. The Act has been in force since January and we are now in the last month of the year; yet to this day the county councils have not had clear instructions as to how they are to administer the Act. I therefore hope the noble Earl will see his way to issue regulations or a circular on the subject.

EARL CARRINGTON: This is a very important point, and I am much obliged to the noble Lord for mentioning it. I will at once consult with the Local Government Board on the subject and see whether a notice might be circulated to remove any misunderstanding there may be, though I was not aware that there was any misunderstanding.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I should like to ask the noble Earl whether, in the case of a scheme which has been approved by the Board of Agriculture, the Local Earl Carrington.

Government Board will insist on sending down their own valuer, and, if so, whether there is any appeal as to a difference between the two valuers.

EARL CARRINGTON: I think that, in ordinary cases, the Local Government Board will accept the valuation of the Board of Agriculture and give us credit for trying to be fair to all parties. I hope that any difficulty of the kind referred to by my noble friend will be entirely avoided in the future.

House adjourned at ten minutes past Six o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter past Three o'clock.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Irish Land Purchase.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY (Limerick, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say what steps tenants on an estate may take to enable them to purchase their holdings where the lease under which the middle landlord holds from the head landlord has not a sufficient number of years to run to entitle him to sell under the Land Act, 1903.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) Where in the case of a sale of an estate, lands held by a middleman are in the exclusive occupation of one or more sub-tenants, and the provisions of Section 15 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, apply, the Estates Commissioners have power to redeem the intervening interest when dealing with the estate under that Act.

Women Clerks and Inspectors in the Home Office.

MR. COOPER (Southwark, Bermondsey): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there are any women clerks or inspectors in his Department, and, if any, will he give the numbers in each division.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) The Answer is in the affirmative. The numbers and positions occupied are as follows: Fifteen inspectors of factories and workshops; six clerks in the factory department; one sub-inspector of reformatory and industrial schools; one inspector of prisons and inebriate reformatories.

Loss of the "Spartan Prince."

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON (Middlesbrough): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the loss of the steamer "Spartan Prince," and if he can state why no inquiry has been held with reference to the loss of this vessel; and whether he is aware that some of the crew have made lengthy affidavits stating that the circumstances under which this vessel foundered were not satisfactory.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) My attention has been called to the loss of the steamer "Spartan Prince" after collision with the ship "Timandra," but, in the absence of the latter vessel from this country, I have not considered it desirable to order a formal investigation which, in the circumstances, must be of an ex parte character. No affidavits have been received from the crew, whilst the preliminary inquiries made at Ceara, Barbados, and in this country do not seem to call for further investigation; but I shall be prepared to consider any fresh information that may be brought to my notice with a view to any further action that may be found desirable.

Spanish Crew of the Steamer "Cartsdike."

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it has been brought to his notice that the owners of the steamer "Cartsdike," now bound from Bilbao, Spain, to Ayr, Scotland, is carrying a number of Spaniards who are to be engaged as the crew of the "Cartsdike" in place of the men now serving on the vessel; whether he will take steps to insist that the language test will be applied to the Spaniards so as to see that they can comply with the requirements of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906; and whether, in view of the number of unemployed in the United Kingdom at present, he will bring to the notice of the shipowners generally that by bringing in foreign labour numbers of our own countrymen are being thrown out of employment.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The "Cartsdike" arrived at Ayr on 24th November. Inquiry has been made into the matter referred to in the Question, and I am informed that no foreign seamen have been brought to this country in the vessel as passengers for the purpose of being engaged in place of the men serving during the recent voyage. The provisions of Section 12 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, will be enforced in this and all similar cases, but I do not see my way to issue a general communication to shipowners in the sense suggested by my hon. friend.

Evicted Tenants—Delay in Reinstatement of Mrs. Margaret Rice.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Cork County, N.E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will ascertain from the Estates Commissioners the cause of the delay in the reinstatement of Mrs. Margaret Rice in her old holding of Coole Upper, near Fermoy, on the M'Causland estate, County Cork.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have made a formal offer for the purchase of Mrs. Rice's former holding. This offer has been accepted by the owner, and it is expected that Mrs. Rice will be reinstated at an early date.

Illegal Trawling in Dundrum Bay.

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Department of Agriculture for Ireland has been called to the injury caused to the fishing industry in Dundrum Bay, County Down, by illegal trawling; whether he is aware that the matter was brought under the notice of the Council of the Department at the last meeting; and what steps are being taken to deal with the subject.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Department are aware that illegal trawling has been in progress by local boats in Dundrum Bay. Since March last the Department have instituted legal proceedings for this offence in ten cases. Three more are pending. The Department will spare no effort to capture offenders, and hope that the local magistrates will inflict such penalties as may prove effectual in stopping illegal trawling. I understand that the matter was discussed at the meeting of the Council of Agriculture on the 24th ultimo, when, after the Department's explanation, the resolution of Colonel Sharman-Crawford dealing with the matter was not pressed.

Privileged Cabs at Woolwich Station.

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will inquire of the Woolwich police as to the working of the privilege cab system at the Arsenal Station; whether it would be in the interest of the travelling public to declare the station an open one; and whether friction is caused by the privileged cabmen taking the outside stands in addition to the privilege stand.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) The inquiry which, as I informed the hon. Member last Monday, I am making into this matter is not yet completed. I hope to be able to inform him of my decision very shortly.

Compensation under Licensing Act, 1904.

MR. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is now prepared to consider favourably any application by the Quarter Sessions of a county for his consent to the borrowing on the security of the compensation fund of any sums required for the purpose of paying compensation under the Licensing Act, 1904.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) In my Answer on this subject on 12th April last I gave an anticipated change in the law as my reason for limiting to the present year the period of repayment of loans applied for under the Act of 1904. In the absence of this reason I should, of course, not think it necessary to impose such a limit.

Procedure in County Courts.

MR. T. R. BETHELL (Essex, Maldon): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Lord Chancellor has appointed a Commission to advise him as to the procedure of the County Courts and as to improving that procedure, or what is the nature of the Commission now inquiring and to whom will its Report be made; and whether it will, as soon as practicable, be issued to the Members of this House or brought to the attention of the House; and whether the inquiry will extend to the question of the fees charged in the County Courts and to the complaint that they are excessive, and to the working of the system of administration orders.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) The Judicature Committee (presided over by Lord Macnaghten) in the Report, recently presented, recommended amongst other things, that : " The Lord Chancellor be requested to appoint a Committee to consider the relations now subsisting between the High Court and the County Courts, and to report whether any and what alteration or modification should be made in those relations, and consequently in the jurisdiction and practice of the County Courts." In pursuance of that recommendation, the Lord Chancellor has invited a Departmental Committee, with Sir J. Gorell Barnes as chairman, to consider and advise him on the subject.

Wages Dispute at Grangemouth.

MR. GEORGE ROBERTS (Norwich) : To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is aware that a Grangemouth employer of dock labour has dismissed certain men because they have instituted legal proceedings against him to secure the short payment of wages which he has withheld from them on the piece work system ; and if he contemplates any action to prevent employers taking such action against men who are demanding simple justice.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.)
I have seen the letter which the hon. Member has been good enough to send me on the subject of the case referred to in the Question. The matter is outside the powers conferred by the Factory Act, and there is no action which it is possible for me to take to protect workmen, but the question of checking piecework wages in dock labour has been the subject of inquiry by a Departmental Committee, who have now reported, and I hope next session to introduce legislation which will place the workers in a different position in this matter.

The Press and Coroners' Courts.

MR. J. MACVEAGH : To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department with reference to the exclusion of the accredited representatives of the Press agencies and of the daily papers from the coroner's Court of St. Giles's, London, on the 21st ultimo, whether his attention has been called to the fact that one of those representatives was in Court before the coroner arrived and was requested to leave, and that the other representatives arrived before the inquest opened ; whether he is aware that the Press box was almost empty ; whether, in face of those statements, he has any further information as to why these Press representatives were excluded ; whether he can explain why the written protest from the journalists was not at once delivered to the coroner ; and whether the coroner's officer has been admonished.

MR. BYLES (Salford, N.) : To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in reference to the exclusion of certain recognised Press representatives from the coroner's Court of St. Giles's, London, on the 21st ultimo, whether he has been made aware that the reporters who were excluded had not arrived late ; that one of them at least was actually inside the Court when the coroner arrived, and was ordered out by the coroner's officer ; that there was no overcrowding in the Court, inasmuch as a solitary police inspector was occupying the Press box ; in the light of this fresh evidence will he renew his inquiries into the matter of complaint ; and will he take such measures as will insure the publicity, in conformity with immemorial usage, of coroners' quests.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.)
I beg leave to answer this and the next Question together. I have again communicated with the coroner, and I learn from him that a gentleman who had entered the Court before the coroner had arrived was requested to leave until the Court was open. The coroner regrets that any representative of the Press should have been excluded, and assures me that such a thing has not happened before and is not likely to happen again. His officer states positively that he received no written communication, and that he was not aware of its existence. I do not think that the incident calls for any further action on my part. I have no authority to issue instructions to coroners in this matter, and it is clear from the coroner's statement that he is anxious to give full facilities for the presence of the Press in Court.

Case of J. J. Jelly, of Workington.

MR. CROOKS: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of John James Jelly, heard at the Workington Police Court on 25th November, who was proved to be in great poverty from unemployment and had a dying child, and that there was neither fire nor food in his house, who was sentenced to fourteen days imprisonment for stealing coal of the value of 2s. 2d., the defence being that he could not get a ticket for work and wanted the coppers to buy milk for his child; and will he take steps to reduce the sentence.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) I have made inquiry into this case, but I have found no ground for intervention on my part. The prisoner has been discharged on part payment of the fine. This was his third conviction of stealing during the present year.

Rent of Teacher's House in Elementary Schools.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether the word "schoolhouse," in the Elementary Education (No. 2) Bill, does or does not include the teacher's house in those public elementary schools where rent is now paid by the local authority to the trustees of the school.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) I would draw the hon. Member's attention to the provisions in regard to the teacher's house which are proposed by a Government Amendment to Clause 5, which is on to-day's Paper.

Cooper School, Marston Sicca.

MR. ESSEX (Gloucestershire, Cirencester): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether a settlement has been made of the affairs of the Cooper School at Marston Sicca, Gloucestershire; and, if so, what are its terms.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The Board have consented to postpone further proceedings in this case pending a joint meeting of parish councils and other local bodies interested which, it is understood, is being convened to consider the terms of the draft scheme.

Elementary Education—Administrative and Loan Charges.

MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether he can state what was the average sum per child spent by local education authorities on administration and loan charges during the year ending 31st March, 1907, in London, the county boroughs, London and the county boroughs taken together, and throughout the country.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.)—

Cost of Medical Inspection of Schools.

MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether he has received representations from local authorities, drawing his attention to the expenses, of medical inspection provided for by the Education (Administrative Provisions) Act of last year; and whether any further assistance is to be provided from the Exchequer so as to enable this inspection to be carried on efficiently.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) I have already stated that there is, in my opinion, the strongest objection to giving special grants for specific purposes in connection with elementary education, but under the financial proposals in connection with the Bill now before the House local education authorities will receive a large additional grant to assist them in carrying out medical inspection and their other duties in respect of elementary education.

Secondary Schools and Training Colleges

SIR PHILIP MAGNUS (London University): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether he intends the education settlement to be produced by the Education Bill to include a settlement of the difficulties that have arisen in the last three years in regard to secondary schools and training colleges; and, in particular, whether, in that event, he intends to make the requisite modifications in the secondary schools and training college regulations so that denominational schools and colleges shall receive grants from the Board of Education equivalent to the grants for those provided by the local authority, as will be the case in regard to elementary schools under the settlement embodied in the Bill.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The various points referred to by the hon. Member do not arise under the Education Bill, which deals only with elementary education. If the Bill now under discussion is passed, the position of Non-conformists and others who are now under disabilities in other parts of the public educational system will no doubt be affected thereby, but the hon. Member's Questions are hypothetical, and it would be premature for me to give him a definite reply at present.

Out-Relief Administration at Wavertree.

MR. GEORGE ROBERTS: To ask the President of the Local Government

Board if his attention has been directed to the practice of paying outdoor relief on the premises of a political club at Wavertree, Liverpool, though the town hall is situated nearly opposite the club in question; whether he can state to what extent this practice prevails; if it meets with his sanction; and, if not, will he take steps to end it.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I am informed that under agreements dating from 1889 the guardians have the use of a large room as a pay station at the Conservative Working Men's Club at Wavertree. The rent paid is £7 a year, which includes heating, cleaning, and accommodation for about 100 persons. The room is used for a short time once a week, and is then exclusively in the occupation of the guardians. No sanction on the part of the Local Government Board has been given in this matter. As regards the town hall, I am informed that it is improbable that any application by the guardians to the corporation for the hire of a room large enough for the purpose for which it would be required would be acceded to.

Law Officers of the Crown and Old-Age Pensions.

MR. SNOWDEN (Blackburn): To ask the President of the Local Government Board when he hopes to receive the opinions of the Law Officers on the points which have been submitted to them arising out of the Old-Age Pensions Act.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have submitted two cases to the Law Officers on questions arising out of the Act. I have received their opinion in one of the cases, and as regards the other I have asked them to let me have their opinion at the earliest date practicable.

Distress at Grays Thurrock.

MR. WARDLE (Stockport): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has received an application from the Grays Thurrock Urban District Council for sanction to create a distress committee; and whether he is prepared to grant the application.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I received an application for this purpose on Tuesday last, and I have referred it to the inspector of the district to report to me upon it.

Loughborough Distress.

MR. CLYNES (Manchester, N.E.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has received an application from the town council of Loughborough for sanction to create a distress committee; and, if so, whether he is prepared to grant the application.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have received the application referred to, and have decided to comply with it.

Wimbledon Distress.

MR. CLYNES: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether any application has been made to his Board by the town council of Wimbledon for sanction to appoint a distress committee; and, if so, whether he can state the nature of the reply given.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) No actual application for the establishment of a distress committee has been made by the town council of Wimbledon this winter, but they have applied for a contribution from the Parliamentary grant. I wrote on 4th November, asking for particulars of unemployment, schemes of work, etc., but I have not so far received any reply beyond an acknowledgment.

Chiswick Distress.

MR. O'GRADY (Leeds, E.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether an application has been received from the urban district council of Chiswick for sanction to appoint a distress committee; and whether his Board is prepared to grant the application.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have received an application in the sense referred to in the Question. As the district council have arranged contracts for the execution of works estimated at cost in the aggregate over £26,000, all of which will contain a clause that local labour shall be employed, I have suggested that the question of establishing a distress committee might be deferred.

Brentford Distress.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his Board has received an application from the urban district council of Brentford for sanction to create a distress committee; and whether his Board is prepared to grant the application.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have received the application, but in view of the small population, and of the other circumstances, I do not think I should be justified in acceding to it.

Harrogate Distress.

MR. SUMMERBELL: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has received an application from the town council of Harrogate for sanction to create a distress committee; and whether he is prepared to grant the application.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I do not find that I have received any such application from the town council of Harrogate since 1905.

Stoke-on-Trent Distress.

MR. T. F. RICHARDS (Wolverhampton, W.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is in receipt of an application from the borough of Stoke-on-Trent for sanction to create a distress committee; whether two previous applications have been made and sanction has been refused; and whether, in view of the desire prevalent in Stoke for a distress committee, he is prepared to grant the present application.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have not hitherto seen my way to establish a distress committee in the borough of Stoke-on-Trent. I have now a renewed application from the town council before me which I am considering.

Folkestone Distress.

MR. GEORGE ROBERTS: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether any reply has yet been given by his Board to the application of the town council of Folkestone for sanction to create a distress committee; and if so, will he state the nature of the reply.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have not seen my way to establish a distress committee at Folkestone at the present time.

Memoranda on Fiscal Policy.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will consent to issue an official Memorandum by Professor Hewins on the Fiscal Policy of International Trade in the same way as he has issued a Memorandum by Professor Marshall on the same subject.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) As my right hon. friend stated in reply to the hon. Member for Dulwich on the 24th ultimo, Mr. Marshall's Memorandum was prepared for and on the invitation of the late Government, and was only published owing to the hon. Member's own request. He at the same time explained why he considered it undesirable to issue a rejoinder at the public expense.

Irish Old-Age Pension Claimants.

MR. KETTLE (Tyrone, E.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the official estimate of the number of persons in Ireland over seventy years of age in 1908 is 184,000; whether he is aware that the official estimate of the numbers of the same class of persons in 1907 was 173,359; whether the wide discrepancy between these two estimates casts doubt on the accuracy of both; and will he take steps to obtain a less speculative estimate.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The estimated number of persons in Ireland of the age of seventy years and upwards in the middle of the year 1908 was 183,639. For the middle of 1907 the estimate was 183,876.

Registration of Births in Ireland.

MR. KETTLE: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the system of registration of births in Ireland is of much more recent origin than the corresponding system in Great Britain; whether, consequently, the materials available for forming an estimate of the numbers of the population over seventy years of age are much less adequate in Ireland than in Great Britain; and whether the figure, 184,000, is in fact anything more than a rough approximation founded largely on guess-work.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The system of registration of births in Ireland is of much more recent origin than the corresponding system in Great Britain, but this fact has no relation to the question of estimating the number of persons of the age of seventy years and upwards at the present time. The figure 183,639, or in round numbers 184,000, is not a guess but a fairly approximate estimate, obtained by applying the percentage of males and females, aged seventy years and upwards, as ascertained at the census of 1901, to the estimated total number of males and females in the middle of the year 1908.

Pensions and Profits on Small Holdings.

MR. KETTLE: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether private instructions have been issued to pension officers prescribing the mode in which they are to calculate the profits derived from small holdings in Ireland; whether he is aware that in many cases the pension officers estimate these profits as being twice the Poor Law valuation; and, if private instructions have been issued, will he communicate them to the House.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) My right hon. friend cannot add anything to the replies which he has already given on this subject. As he has already explained, each case has to be dealt with on its merits. Confidential instructions have been given to pension officers as to the general lines upon which they should guide themselves in their reports to the committees; but these instructions do not—nor is it in his opinion desirable that they should—bind the committees, or (upon appeal) the Local Government Board, whose duty it is to exercise an independent discretion in the matter. For this reason, it does not appear to him to be desirable to publish the confidential instructions in question.

Irish Taxation.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can form any estimate of the probable amount of extra taxation that will be imposed upon Ireland in respect of old-age pensions.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) It is not possible to answer this Question until the amount of the extra taxation (if any) required has been determined, the precise taxes to be imposed have been decided on, and their incidence as between Great Britain and Ireland has been ascertained.

London Education Grant.

MR. W. PEARCE (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, as London receives from existing grants payable in respect of elementary education a lower grant than the rest of England and Wales, he will exempt London from the proposed limitation of 6s. per child under the new grants A, B, and C contained in the financial proposals in connection with the Education Bill.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) The question of these grants is being very carefully considered, but my right hon. friend is not in a position to make any announcement at present.

Pension Regulations.

MR. SNOWDEN: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have given instructions to the pension officers that when the officer has reported to the committee that the claimant is entitled to a pension, and the committee consider that the claimant is disqualified, the appeal, if any, should be made by the claimant; and whether, seeing that such instructions deprive the pension officer of a statutory right given to him by the Old-Age Pensions Act, he will have this instruction at once withdrawn.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) The Answer to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative. The circumstances in which a pension officer should or should not exercise the rights he possesses under the Act appear to my right hon. friend to be a proper subject for the issue of directions by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under Article 34 of the Regulations, and the instruction itself seems to him to be a proper one, since, if the claimant is satisfied with an adverse decision of the pension committee, he can see no reason why the pension officer should seek to interfere. He does not, therefore, propose to take any action.

Poor Relief Disqualification.

MR. SNOWDEN: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is aware that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have instructed the pension officers that receipt of poor relief by a husband will not in their opinion disqualify his wife for receipt for an old-age pension; is he aware that this is one of the points on which the Local Government Board has not made up its mind; and will he say if the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or the Local Government Board is the authority for deciding points of law under the Old-Age Pensions Act.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) Neither the pension officer nor the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have any power to decide questions under the Old-Age Pensions Act. The decision upon all such questions, whether of law or facts, rests under the Act with the local pension committee subject to appeal to the Local Government Board. As regards the particular point raised in the Question I understand that my right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board is advised that, in cases in which a husband has received poor relief for, or on account of, his wife, the wife as well as the husband is disqualified. Pension officers have now been instructed accordingly.

Census of Production Returns.

MR. RENDALL (Gloucestershire, Thornbury): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Excise officers recently made old-age pension officers had placed upon them the duty of collecting the census of production returns; whether agriculturists in many cases objected to make such returns, and even refused to make their ordinary agricultural returns, thus causing the necessity of personal visits and inquiries by the officer; and what payment for these extra services and out-of-pocket expenses will be made to such officers, and when.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) My right hon. friend is informed that the Board of Inland Revenue are not aware that greater difficulty than usual has been experienced by the officers in collecting the agricultural returns. The question of the additional remuneration to be paid to officers for collecting the census of production returns is now being considered by the Board.

Pay of Old-Age Pension Officers.

MR. RENDALL: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer when a definite statement will be made by him to old-age pension officers as to the rates of remuneration to be paid them for their work; what number of hours they are supposed to work daily; whether Sunday work is invited, expected, allowed, or disallowed; and what extra rates of pay will be paid them for weekday and Sunday overtime.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) The question of remuneration will be considered at as early a date as is compatible with the obtaining of full materials for a decision, after the close of the exceptional work for which a gratuity is contemplated. The nature of the duties does not admit of rules being laid down as to daily hours of work, nor have any instructions been given as to work on Sundays.

Fruit Tree Washes.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the value of nicotine washes for spraying fruit trees and the present high cost of such washes, he will take steps to remit the Excise Duty on all tobacco grown in the United Kingdom which is manufactured for horticultural or agricultural purposes.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) All nicotine is already manufactured from duty-free tobacco.

Fines on Pension Officers.

MR. SNOWDEN: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is aware that the Board of Inland Revenue have inflicted a fine of £10 on each of a number of pension officers who have innocently made public the number of claims for pensions received in their districts; that when the attention of the officers was called to the statement that their action was a breach of official regulations they readily admitted their fault and expressed regret; and whether he will take action to modify the severity of the punishment.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) My right hon. friend is aware of the action taken by the Board of Inland Revenue in punishing certain Excise officers who violated the regulations against communicating to the public Press information derived from official sources. If the officers in question had not expressed their regret for their action, a more severe view would necessarily have been taken of conduct which is subversive of all discipline and tends to bring discredit on the public service. He is not prepared to modify the punishment imposed in these cases.

War Office Tailors.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the War Office forward to each officer about to join his regiment a list containing the names of several tailoring firms, to one of whom he is recommended to go for his outfit, to the exclusion of other Army outfitters; and whether this form of preferential treatment has received his sanction, and can he state on what grounds.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) All officers on being gazetted to commissions are furnished with the price lists of the tailors and outfitters who furnish price lists for this purpose. No particular firm is recommended by the War Office and no firm is precluded from being placed on the list.

Volunteer Decorations.

MR. C. B. HARMSWORTH (Worcestershire, Droitwich): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the enhanced value likely to be placed upon the Volunteer officers' decoration and the Volunteer long-service medal, he will take steps to secure that officers, non-commissioned officers, and men who have transferred from the Volunteer Force to the Territorial Army receive the Volunteer officers' decoration or the Volunteer long-service medal in lieu of the corresponding decoration and medal instituted for the Territorial Army, provided that the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men fulfil the conditions of service which governed the Volunteer decoration and the Volunteer long-service medal.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
In view of the fact that the conditions attached to the grant of the Territorial decoration and efficiency medal are more stringent than those formerly called for in respect to the Volunteer rewards, I cannot concur in the opinion expressed by my hon. friend as regards the latter, and I am not prepared to take the steps suggested in the Question.

Territorial Efficiency Medal.

MR. C. B. HARMSWORTH: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the conditions governing the Territorial efficiency medal have been so framed as to exclude from the conferring of this distinction officers who have previously served in the ranks; whether he is aware that an officer of the Volunteer Force who had served in the ranks became eligible for and received the Volunteer long-service medal; and whether he will take steps to secure that officers of the Territorial Army shall be treated in the same way as regards the Territorial efficiency medal as were officers of the Volunteer Force as regards the Volunteer long-service medal.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
The medal was granted to Volunteer officers on retirement after twenty years service if they had served in the ranks, but had not served long enough to earn the decoration. The efficiency medal is granted to the Territorial Force after twelve years service, while the decoration is granted after twenty years service, and, therefore, the proposal of my hon. friend does not appear to be practicable.

Re-enlistments.

MR. COURTHOPE: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether men of the Territorial Force, who re-engage at the end of the period of service for which they enlisted, must under existing conditions be enlisted and attested a second time; and, if so, whether he will take steps to obviate the annoyance and inconvenience which this will inevitably cause before the first year of service in the Territorial Force expires.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
A man of the Territorial Force who, on the termination of his current engagement, desires to continue has only to sign the re-engagement paper. It is not considered that this procedure can cause annoyance or inconvenience.

Musketry Training Committee.

MR. COURTHOPE: To ask the Secretary of State for War who were the expert officers of the Regular and Territorial Forces who are stated, in paragraph 8 of Circular Memorandum No. 111 of 13th November, 1908, to have brought out the new musketry course and instructions after much careful consideration.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
The Committee on the musketry training of the Territorial Force was composed as follows: Lieutenant-General Mackinnon (Chairman); Brigadier-General Murray (Director of Military Training); Colonel Egerton (Commandant School of Musketry); Colonel Cotton Jodrell; Colonels Fremantle and Wilson, and Major Gosling, representing the Territorial Force; Majors Shute H. C. Hill and Kirwan, with Captain T. H. Davidson as Secretary.

Army Boot Contracts.

MR. T. F. RICHARDS: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state the number of pairs of Army boots and shoes obtained during the years 1898-9, 1900-1, 1901-2, the names of counties or towns from which they were obtained, and the number of pairs each town or county supplied.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)

Statement of the Number of Army Boots and Shoes (machine made and hand sewn) received during the years 1898-9, 1900-1, 1901-2, and the County or Town from which they were obtained.

Musketry Practice.

MR. COURTHOPE: To ask the Secretary of State for War under what conditions the grouping practices of the new musketry course will be carried out on the numerous ranges on which, owing to the shooting taking place across a valley or ravine, firing at 100 yards range is impossible, and the approach from the firing points to the targets long and difficult, and, on the large ranges, such as Bisley and Wraysbury, where, owing to the large number of targets in use, great delay would be caused by the necessary interruption of firing while those who had fired on other targets were inspecting their group of shots.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The instructional practices are to act as a guide, and need not be rigidly adhered to. The whole object of the scheme is to enable commanding officers to make use of such facilities as are within their reach, placing a pattern before them to guide them on the right lines. On large ranges grouping practices can be commenced at the same time, and no great delay should occur. It is impossible to legislate for every class of range and every circumstance. I hope hon. Members will not prejudge this scheme before it has been put to a full test.

Territorial Ranges.

MR. COURTHOPE: To ask the Secretary of State for War in view of the fact that most ranges of the Territorial Force are open for class-firing at least twice a week during the spring and summer, what steps will be taken to secure the attendance of officers and details of other corps to carry out the marking and supervision as required by paragraph 8 of the musketry course.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) Supervision and marking will only be performed by officers and men of other units during the annual test. The necessary arrangements will be made by the general officers commanding divisions of the Territorial Force and by officers commanding mounted brigades.

Use of Wind Gauge in Musketry Practice.

MR. COURTHOPE: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, owing to the extreme frequency with which the force of the wind changes in this climate, he will withdraw paragraph 18 of the new musketry instructions, which prohibits the alteration of the wind gauge after the first shot of a classification practice has been fired.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) It is owing to the extreme frequency with which the wind changes in this climate, and to the difficulties and inaccuracies which would arise on active service from frequent alteration of the wind gauge, that it is considered more advisable to practice making allowance for wind in this country by "aiming off."

Hayti Revolt.

MR. GLENDINNING (Antrim, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if it is the intention of the Government to send a man-of-war to Port-au-Prince, seeing the danger to which the lives and property of British subjects are exposed.

(Answered by Sir Edward Grey.) I beg to refer the hon. Member to the Answer returned to-day to the hon. Member for North-Western Lanarkshire.

Grehan Estate, Banteer.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have gazetted the holding on the Grehan estate, Banteer, County Cork, formerly in the occupation of Mr. Timothy Barrett; and, if so, whether, in view of the fact that the land is untenanted, the Commissioners are taking steps to procure the reinstatement of the tenant with the least possible delay.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have notified in the Dublin Gazette their intention to acquire this holding under the Evicted Tenants Act, and are using all despatch in their proceedings under the Act.

Dublin Assistant Teachers.

MR. NANNETTI (Dublin, College Green): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the average salary of trained assistant teachers in ordinary national schools in Dublin city, model schools not included; why are assistant teachers in Dublin schools paid smaller salaries than assistant teachers in London, Edinburgh, or other English or Scottish towns, if they perform equally efficient work; is he aware that no assistant teacher in an ordinary national school in Ireland receives promotion, that is, he is placed in the lowest or third grade and must remain there, no matter what his qualifications and length of service, or how effective his work may be in the school; is he aware that married assistant teachers in Dublin pay from one-third to one-half their salaries for house rent alone, and cannot possibly live up to that standard of decency and respectability expected from those who educate the children of the citizens of Dublin, while unmarried assistants have to pay such high rents for rooms and board that they have not a living wage; and will he recommend the promotion of assistants to the higher grades, according to efficiency and length of service, as they receive the same training, pass the same examinations, possess equal qualifications, and with equal service are quite as efficient as principal teachers.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that the average salary of the assistant teachers referred to in the question is £79 17s. for men and £71 s. 5d. for women. I am not in a position to compare the salary and work of assistant teachers in Dublin with that of assistant teachers in English and Scottish towns. Assistant teachers rank as a rule in the third grade, but there are exceptions to this rule. None have as yet been promoted to a higher grade since 1900. I have no means of ascertaining what house rents they pay. The Commissioners' rules provide for increases of salary to assistant teachers and for their promotion in exceptional circumstances, but it was never contemplated nor would the Commissioners consider it desirable to give assistants the same rights as principals in regard to promotion. The Commissioners desire that principals should, as a rule, be recruited from experienced assistants, but few assistants would be willing to undertake the responsibilities of principals if they could do as well from a monetary point of view by remaining assistants.

White Estate in Leitrim.

MR. F. MEEHAN (Leitrim, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the White Estate at Newtownmanor, North Leitrim, having been offered for sale to the Estates Commissioners; and whether, having regard to the fact of a large portion of this estate being waste land, he would urge upon the Commissioners the necessity of purchasing this estate in order to enlarge the many small uneconomic holdings in the district.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) This estate is pending for sale in the Court of the Land Judge. The Estates Commissioners have already intimated to the Judge their estimated price for the untenanted land.

Longford Pass Evicted Tenants.

MR. KENDAL O'BRIEN (Tipperary, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any steps have been taken towards the reinstatement of the evicted tenants on the Langley Estate, Longford Pass; County Tipperary, named respectively Michael Morris, Laurence Duggan, Edmond Kealey, William Bartley, Pat Leahy, James Bartley, Pat Ryan, and Thomas Maher.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have had this estate inspected and the owner is willing to accept their estimated price. Formal proceedings for sale to the Commissioners have been instituted and the Commissioners are about to make a formal offer in compliance with Section 6 of the Irish Land Act, 1903. Until this offer has been accepted the Commissioners will not be in a position to allot the lands.

Knockaderry Evicted Tenant.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say whether the Estates Commissioners have taken any steps to reinstate the widow Browne in the farm from which her husband was evicted about fifteen years ago, known as the Glebe, situate near Knockaderry, in the County of Limerick; whether he is aware that the farm is at present under the representatives, or Commissioners, of the late Established Church, who are paying £1 per week to a caretaker for herding it, without getting any return for the outlay; and will he see that the Estates Commissioners reinstate her without further delay.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Land Commission inform me that an advance for the purchase of this holding was made to the late William Brown by the Church Temporalities Commissioners in 1877. Owing to his failure to pay the purchase annuity, Brown was dispossessed in 1894. Since then several attempts to sell the holding have failed. The provisions of the Evicted Tenants Act do not apply to such a case.

Indian Army Charges.

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for India, with reference to the agreement arrived at between the Secretary of State for India and the Secretary of State for War that an additional payment of £300,000 a year shall be made from 1st May, 1908, from the Indian revenues to cover the cost of the training of troops and other services connected with the maintenance of the British establishments in India, whether the Indian Government recently sent a despatch to the Secretary of State setting forth objections to that arrangement; whether he can state the nature of those objections; whether the Indian Government was consulted or previously apprised of the proposed terms of that agreement before it was concluded; and whether he will lay a copy of the despatch upon the Table.

(Answered by Mr. Buchanan.) A despatch has been received from the Government of India setting forth certain objections of a detailed and technical character which cannot well be summarised. As I informed the hon. Member, in answer to a Question on 19th October, the arrangement between the Secretary of State for India and the Secretary of State for War was arrived at on the basis of the recommendation of the Romer Committee, on which the Government of India were represented by Lieutenant-General Sir B. Duff, Chief of the Staff in India. I have already stated that the Secretary of State does not think it would be in the public interest to present Papers on the subject.

Irish Railways—Cattle Transit.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture (Ireland) whether he can state the number of adverse reports that have been made to him by his inspectors regarding the inadequate loading accommodation and irregular cattle transit of the various Irish railways; and whether he will state what steps he intends to take to act on these reports and remedy the existing state of cattle transit in Ireland.

(Answered by Mr. T. W. Russell.) Inspectors of the Department are constantly visiting railway stations to report on the animal transit arrangements. A numerical statement of the nature suggested in the Question would not be of any real value, and might lead to erroneous inferences. The Department are in frequent communication with the railway companies on matters arising out of the inspectors' reports; and by this procedure, coupled with, when necessary, consultation with the railway officials, improvements in the accommodation for animal traffic have been brought about at many stations. At some others improvements are known to be contemplated, while in further instances consideration is pending, and the matter will not be lost sight of by the Department.

Railway Coupling Accidents.

MR. MADDISON (Burnley): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will state the number of fatal and non-fatal accidents caused by the coupling and uncoupling of vehicles on the railways of the United Kingdom

Number of Servants of Railway Companies killed and injured whilst engaged in coupling and uncoupling operations in each month of the years 1905 and 1906.

Poor Relief and Pensions.
MR. VERNEY (Buckinghamshire, N.) : To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in the case of a married woman, aged seventy-four, and living with her husband, who is in receipt of 4s. 6d. per week parish relief, 2 . of which is refunded to the guardians by their son, the woman, who has had no parish relief, is entitled to a pension.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) If the relief is given solely for the support of the husband, the wife would not be disqualified. If it is given towards her support as well as that of her husband, she would be.

Hampstead Town Hall.
MR. COOPER (Southwark, Bermondsey) : To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been directed to the recommendation now before the council of the metropolitan borough of Hampstead to expend £192 in furnishing a robing room in the town hall for the mayor ; whether this council recently refused to increase the wages of its dustmen, amounting to £162, because the rates of Hampstead are 7s. 2d. in the pound ; whether any application has been made by thi council to his Board for a grant to help the unemployed in this borough ; whether the sanction of the Local Government Board has to be obtained before expending this sum of money on a robing room; and, if so, will he consider the advisability of refusing to sanction it.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I understand that a recommendation was made to the borough council by their works committee, to the effect that a sum of £192 should be spent in adapting and furnishing the existing robing room for use as a mayor's parlour, but that the council referred the matter back to the committee, who now recommend that a sum of £10 should be spent on doing up the robing room. This recommendation will come before the council at their meeting to-day. No sanction on the part of the Local Government Board to the expenditure is necessary. I am informed that the wages of the whole of the staff of the borough council are considered by the council in January of each year, that in 1906 the wages of the dustmen were increased and that no proposal to increase their wages has been before the council since that date. I understand that the borough council are expending a sum of about £3,300 upon work for the unemployed. No application has been made to me for a payment from the grant in respect of this work. The cost is being defrayed by the borough council themselves.

Poor Relief and Pensions.

MR. SUMMERBELL: To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can state whether a man and his wife, aged respectively seventy-seven and seventy-four years, who at present are living with a son who is a humble worker, and who are in receipt of a sum of 4s. 6d. per week through the guardians, such money being contributed by three sons at the rate of 1s. 6d. each per week, are either jointly or individually entitled to the receipt of an old-age pension.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) If in fact relief is given by the guardians for or on account of these poor persons they would both be disqualified for receiving an old-age pension, although the amount of the relief is repaid to the guardians by the sons.

Parliament Buildings.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, College): To ask the First Commissioner of Works if he will say how many rooms in the Houses of Parliament are utilised for all purposes by the Commons, how many by the Peers, and how many by the members of the Press.

(Answered by Mr. L. Harcourt.) The Answer is: Peers, 113; Commons, 204; Press, 25.

Assistant Surveyors of Taxes.

MR. CAVE: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in September last, while an examination of candidates for the post of Assistant Surveyor of Taxes was actually proceeding, nineteen vacancies in the office were filled by the appointment of candidates who had previously sat for junior appointments in the Admiralty and other offices; whether such appointments were a breach of one of the conditions governing the examination in question, namely, that candidates passing the examination would be appointed to fill such vacancies as might exist at the date of the examination or within six months after its commencement; and whether it is possible, in order to satisfy those who were disappointed by reason of these appointments, to offer to the first nineteen of the candidates who were unsuccessful at the examination the first nineteen vacancies in the office of Assistant Surveyor of Taxes or other equivalent appointments.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) I would refer the hon. and learned Member to the reply given by my right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the 24th ultimo, to the hon. Member for North Fermanagh. I will send him a copy.

H.M.S. "Barfleur."

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what were the dates of the successive appointments of six captains to H.M.S. "Barfleur" and the changing of five crews in the twenty-four months ending 19th March, 1907, as stated to have taken place in the official Answer to a Question on 19th March, 1907.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The six captains were: Captain C. H. Adair, appointed 18th February, 1905; Captain Leslie C. Stuart, 4th April, 1905; Captain E. S. Fitzherbert, 10th May, 1905; Captain Claud A. W. Hamilton, 16th November, 1905; Captain Hugh H. D. Tothill, 19th March, 1906; Captain Peyton Hoskyns, 25th February, 1907. The crews were changed on 4th April, 1905; 10th May, 1905; 28th November, 1905; 20th September, 1906; and 5th March, 1907.

Servian Parcels Post.

Mr. B. S. STRAUS (Tower Hamlets, Mile End): To ask the Postmaster-General whether parcels containing samples of merchandise sent by parcel post to Servia in strict conformity with the regulations are being detained on the Austro-Hungarian frontier by the Austrian postal or customs' officers; if so, whether the latter have any power to open hampers or parcels sent from the London Post Office; whether this is contrary to the International Parcels Post Convention; and what steps do His Majesty's Government propose to take to put an end to such interference with international trade.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) No information has reached me as to irregular treatment of articles sent by parcels post to Servia. Direct parcel mails for Servia are not despatched from this office, the parcels being sent in mails for Germany or Austria. The United Kingdom is not a party to the special convention of the Postal Union relating to the parcel post; but the Anglo-Austrian Parcel Post Agreement provides, in the same way as the international convention, that the internal legislation of each country is applicable generally to parcels sent through that country. Parcels for Servia sent from England are therefore liable in the Austrian service to the Austrian regulations.

Schedule A and Rating Valuations.

MR. DUNDAS WHITE (Dumbartonshire): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state what is the general proportion between the annual values of properties as adopted for Schedule A of the Income-Tax Acts and the annual values of the same properties as adopted for rating; and whether in any places the same valuations are adopted for both purposes.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) In England and Wales (excluding the Metropolis) the aggregate values for Schedule A are about 10 per cent. in excess of the values for local rating purposes. In the Metropolis and in Scotland and Ireland the valuations for either purpose are practically identical.

Valuation of Securities of the Post Office Savings Bank.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether a valuation, at market values, of the securities held against the deposits in the Post Office Savings Bank would show a deficiency of approximately £15,000,000; and, if so, has he considered the question of taking measures to charge this deficiency upon the Consolidated Fund, in accordance with the provisions of 26 and 27 Vict., c. 25.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I beg leave to refer to the Answers given to previous Questions of my hon. friend on this subject on 9th and 18th July, 1907, and 24th February last. To those Answers I have nothing to add, except to point out that the Act quoted in the present Question relates to Trustee Savings Banks, not to Post Office Savings Banks, and that Section 7 of the Act, authorising in certain circumstances a charge on the Consolidated Fund, was repealed by Section 15 of the Savings Banks Act, 1904.

Infantry Battalions.

MR. GODFREY BARING (Isle of Wight): To ask the Secretary of State for War what is the existing number of battalions of Regular infantry on the Home, Indian, and Colonial establishments, respectively; what are the the peace and war establishments of a battalion in each category; and with this establishment what would be the number of infantry soldiers in the Army Reserve, irrespective of Special Reservists, on 1st January, 1920.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
At the end of the trooping season there will be seventy-four battalions at home, twenty-two in the Colonies and Egypt, and fifty-two in India. The peace establishments (excluding officers) are—

Home	-	-	-	777
Colonies and Egypt	-	-	-	904
India	-	-	-	1,004

and the war establishments are—

Home	-	-	-	979
Colonies and Egypt	-	-	-	979

Assuming that no further changes in establishments and terms of service are made, the Reserve on 1st January, 1920, would be at about the normal, i.e., 63,370.

Military Expenditure of the Great Powers.

MR. MADDISON: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will state what are the total aggregate amounts which have been devoted to military expenditure during the last ten years (1899–1900 to 1908–9) by Great Britain, Germany, France, and Russia respectively.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Contract for Protected Cruisers.
MR. WATT (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty
VOL. CXCVII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

ality whether all the orders for protected cruisers of the improved "Boadicea" type which the Government intend placing at this time have now been placed; if so, will he say how many have been ordered from Clyde ship-builders; are these vessels to be fitted with Yarrow or with Babcock boilers; and will he state the comparative merits of the type of boiler chosen.
THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. McKenna, Monmouthshire, N.): The reply to the first part of the hon. Member's Question is in the affirmative. Three of the vessels ordered are to be built on the Clyde. The ships will be fitted with Yarrow boilers. It is not desirable to make such a statement as is suggested in the last part of the Question.

Unarmoured Cruiser Contracts.
MR. CROOKS (Woolwich): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty
3 M

whether the order for the fifth cruiser has been placed; and, if not, will he again consider the claim of London and place it on the Thames to be built.

MR. McKENNA: All the six unarmoured cruisers of this year's programme have been ordered. Five have been placed with private firms, and the sixth was laid down last June at Pembroke.

Anti-Torpedo Destroyer Armaments.

MR. MIDDLEMORE (Birmingham, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Admiralty propose taking steps to improve the anti-torpedo destroyer armament on His Majesty's ships "Natal," "Achilles," "Cochrane," and "Warrior."

MR. McKENNA: The Admiralty do not propose to make any change.

MR. MIDDLEMORE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the armaments of these vessels are 9.2 and 7.1, and that they are incapable of rapid action?

MR. McKENNA: I am aware of that.

The New Destroyers.

MR. MIDDLEMORE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will state definitely the size, horse-power, anticipated speed, and armament of the sixteen destroyers of the 1908-9 programme; and to state the size, horse-power, speed, and armament of the "Tribal" destroyers.

MR. McKENNA: The figures for the sixteen destroyers of the 1908-9 programme are: Displacement, 930-1,030 tons; speed, 27 knots; armament, 5-12-pounder guns, two torpedo tubes. Those for the early "Tribal" destroyers are: Displacement, 950-975 tons; speed, 33 knots; armament, 3-12-pounder guns, two torpedo tubes. Those for the later "Tribal" destroyers are: Displacement, 1,050-1,100 tons; speed, 33 knots; armament, 2-4-inch guns, two torpedo tubes. The figures with regard to the displacement of the later "Tribal" class and the new programme destroyers, and the speed of the latter, are estimates only. The estimated horse-power for the 27-knot destroyers is 12,000, the contract conditions for the "Tribal" destroyers did not provide for the horse-power to be measured, and no official record of the power on contractors' trial was obtained.

MR. MIDDLEMORE: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for this very full information.

Trials of New Destroyers.

MR. MIDDLEMORE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the negotiations have now been completed for the purchase of the two destroyers to replace the lost "Gala" and "Tiger," and, if so, can he give particulars of their dimensions, their speed, and their names.

MR. McKENNA: The negotiations referred to have not been completed.

MR. MIDDLEMORE: When are they likely to be completed? I first asked this Question seventeen days ago.

MR. McKENNA: The negotiations have been protracted because the trials have not been quite satisfactory. That is not the fault of the Admiralty, of course.

MR. MIDDLEMORE: Does the right hon. Gentleman expect to be in a position to give the information before the end of the present session?

MR. McKENNA: It does not depend on me.

Admiralty Contracts.

MR. W. THORNE (West Ham, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will have printed with the Votes the names of the firms that contracted for the cruisers and destroyers; and the amount of each tender.

MR. McKENNA: The tenders for the cruisers and destroyers have only been provisionally accepted, and the tender prices cannot, therefore, be given. It is not in accordance with usual practice to publish in the Navy Estimates the total cost of ships during the first year of their construction, and therefore it would be undesirable to give this information in another form.

In reply to Mr. CURRAN (Jarrow),
MR. McKENNA said the orders had been allocated with due regard to the interests of the Navy, the prices tendered, and the desirability of distributing the work. It was not the custom to place orders without regard to cost.

MR. JENKINS (Chatham): Are the lowest tenders accepted?

MR. McKENNA: Yes, so far as is consistent with the other considerations I have mentioned.

MR. CURRAN: Do the Admiralty also investigate whether the firms tendering pay trade union rates of wages?

*MR. SPEAKER: That does not arise out of the Question on the Paper.

Dockyard Employees.

MR. T. F. RICHARDS (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can give the number of men employed in the dockyards and victualling yards, casually and permanently, during the last weeks in November, 1898, and the last week in 1908; and whether all the permanent men are entitled to pensions as a condition of their employment.

MR. McKENNA: The number of men employed in the Home Dockyards at the end of November, 1898 and 1908, were as follows:—

Yard.	Week ended 19th November, 1898.	Week ended 21st November, 1908.
Portsmouth - - - - -	8,268	10,609
Devonport - - - - -	6,879	8,999
Chatham - - - - -	6,770	8,767
Sheerness - - - - -	2,045	2,031
Pembroke - - - - -	2,495	2,064
West India Docks - - -	235	217
Haulbowline - - - - -	217	792
Total - - - - -	26,909	33,479

The only men who would be entitled to pension are those on the established list.

MR. T. F. RICHARDS pointed out that the right hon. Gentleman had not stated how many of the hands were on the established list, neither had he given the figures for certain victualling yards.

MR. McKENNA: I regret I am unable to give the information.

MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): How far is the right hon. Gentleman's Answer consistent with the undertaking of Ministers to reduce the extravagant expenditure on our armaments?

[No Answer was returned.]

Anarchist Outrages in India.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he can inform the House what action has been taken upon representations by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, the Calcutta Trades Association, and the European Anglo-Indian Defence Association, urging upon the Government of India the necessity for the immediate establishment of a special tribunal of High Court Judges to deal summarily with all persons convicted of Anarchist outrages, and recommending certain additions to the existing laws of British India in order to the suppression of sedition.

THE UNDER - SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. BUCHANAN, Perthshire, E.): The whole subject is being considered with the care that it demands. The Secretary of State is unable at present to say anything further.

Tampering with Indian Native Troops.

MR. REES: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether a Brahmin was lately charged at Jhansi with tampering with the loyalty of the native troops at that station; and, if the answer be in the affirmative, whether the accused was convicted; and, if so, what punishment was inflicted.

MR. BUCHANAN: The Secretary of State has seen in the newspapers the report of such a case, in which the accused was ordered to find sureties for good behaviour, but he has no official information on the subject.

MR. REES asked whether the Secretary of State would cause inquiry to be made with a view of taking due notice of the conduct of a magistrate who awarded so trivial a punishment for so heinous an offence as suborning troops to treason.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil): Will the Under-Secretary also undertake to inquire as to the nature of the evidence?

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): May I ask the hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that all these troubles have come upon India since the Member for Montgomery Boroughs left; and whether he will consider the advisability of sending him back again?

MR. REES rose to put a further Question.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order.

MR. BUCHANAN: It is not in our power to take that drastic action to which allusion has been made. It would be, I think, very unwise now to express any opinion upon this case, when we are not in possession of the details of the evidence; but I might point out that, after all, it is a serious offence with which this man was charged—namely, actively tampering with the Sepoys, and that he was turned out of the cantonment with contumely by a native officer.

MR. REES: May I ask the hon. Gentleman whether he will advise the hon. Member—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order.

Indian Army Pay.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the increased rates of pay for the Indian Army foreshadowed in the King's Message will apply to all ranks and to the British officers serving in that force as well.

MR. BUCHANAN: The precise nature of the increase of pay referred to in the King's Message will very shortly be announced by the Government of India, and the Secretary of State is unable to make any statement at present.

MR. ASHLEY: Will the increase apply to all ranks?

MR. BUCHANAN: I am unable to make any statement on the subject.

Indian Army Charges.

MR. HART-DAVIES (Hackney, N.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India has protested against the increase of £300,000 a year to the Home charges of the Indian Army; and whether, if so, the despatch embodying their objections will be laid upon the Table of the House.

MR. BUCHANAN: The Answer to the first Question is in the affirmative. As I stated on a former occasion, the Secretary of State has decided not to lay the Report of the Romer Committee before the House, and the Government of India's despatch could not be presented separately.

South Nigerian Expedition.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, with the intention of opening up the whole of the hitherto unexplored regions of South Nigeria, a force of 800 men will start operations under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Trenchard, D.S.O., in a few weeks, and that the work of bringing the districts under control is expected to last six or seven months; whether he can give any account of this projected expedition and the arms and ammunition with which the explorers will be equipped; and whether he can say in how many small wars against native tribes this country is at present engaged, and why this intended expedition has not been communicated to Parliament.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Colonel SEELY, Liverpool, Abercromby): As I explained in the Answer which I gave to my right hon. friend the Member for the Forest of Dean on 24th November, no military expedition is contemplated; I then explained the action which is being taken in the territory in question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Perhaps the Secretary of State will answer the last part of my Question as to how many small wars against natives tribes this country is at present engaged in?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): It does not apply to my office.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Small wars do apply to your office. I am speaking with reference to the Soudan expedition and others, of which this Parliament has been kept in ignorance.

SIR EDWARD GREY: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to put Questions on any particular points, I shall be glad to answer them, but I cannot answer general Questions.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: That is very good of you.

Boycotting of British Indians in the Transvaal.

DR. RUTHERFORD (Middlesex, Brentford): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that British-Indian traders are being systematically boycotted by their white rivals in the Transvaal, the boycott extending to Dutch farmers who prefer to deal with Indians in preference to European traders; and whether the Secretary of State proposes to take any action in the matter.

COLONEL SEELY: No, Sir, the Secretary of State has no official information of any such boycott as that described in the Question.

Colonial Immigration Regulation.

MR. R. DUNCAN (Lanarkshire, Govan): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any official information showing the practice in the various British Dominions as to sums of money required to be possessed by immigrants; and whether there is any preference or relaxation in favour of emigrants from the United Kingdom.

COLONEL SEELY: Information on the subject of the sum which emigrants are required to possess before entering the Colonies was given in my reply on 24th November to a Question put by my hon. friend the Member for the Cirencester division. So far as I know, there is no preference or relaxation in favour of emigrants from the United Kingdom.

Sleeping Sickness in Horses.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the alleged discovery of a successful treatment for sleeping sickness in horses; whether he has any information as to the details of a case at Sierra Leone in which this treatment is alleged to have been successful; and whether, in view of the importance of the subject, he will endeavour to secure that the matter shall receive careful investigation.

COLONEL SEELY: The attention of scientific men in this country and elsewhere is being continually directed to this matter, but the Secretary of State is advised that no successful treatment for trypanosomiasis in horses has yet been discovered. We are in possession of information which leads us to believe that there is a form of trypanosomiasis affecting animals in the neighbouring Colonies to Sierra Leone from which they may recover without any treatment. If, however, the hon. Gentleman will forward me the information on which he relies, we shall be glad to investigate the matter fully.

British-Indians and Transvaal Registration Laws.

DR. RUTHERFORD: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies how many British-Indians of all classes have been imprisoned with and without hard labour for offences against the registration laws of the Transvaal since February last; and whether any more protests have been received from India in the matter.

COLONEL SEELY: I am not in a position to give the figures required, but inquiry shall be made of the Governor. The answer to the last paragraph is in the affirmative.

MR. REES: Do not the British-Indians place themselves in this position voluntarily?

COLONEL SEELY: That is a very nice question as to their actual position.

DR. RUTHERFORD: May I ask whether the harsh treatment meted out to British-Indians in South Africa is not creating great indignation in India?

COLONEL SEELY: I do not think it would be wise to make any general statement. It is a difficult situation.

MR. LUPTON: Would the condition of these Indians be better if India was not under the British Government?

COLONEL SEELY: No, Sir; certainly not.

MR. SCOTT (Ashton-under-Lyne): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to the case of Hira Mulji, a boy of twelve, who was recently sentenced to fourteen days imprisonment for entering the Transvaal with his father, and subsequently sentenced to a further month's imprisonment for the same offence; and whether he proposes to take any steps in this matter, and to prevent the further imprisonment of British-Indian children in like circumstances.

COLONEL SEELY: No, Sir. Inquiry shall be made into the facts.

Hong Kong Riots.

MR. ROBINSON (Brecknock): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he has any information regarding the banishment without trial of the manager and editor of a Chinese newspaper and five prominent Chinese merchants from Hong-Kong; and if he is able to state to the House the nature of the offence for which they have been deported.

COLONEL SEELY: The Governor has informed the Secretary of State by telegram that in consequence of the riots of 2nd November, he used the authority of the local laws to banish three persons not British subjects. The action was taken after careful inquiry in accordance with the advice of the Executive Council. The men are stated to be leaders of the movement for a Japanese boycott which culminated in local disturbances and outrages.

MR. ROBINSON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can give any information regarding the anti-Japanese riots which have occurred in Hong Kong during the last two or three weeks.

COLONEL SEELY: I am afraid that I cannot give my hon. friend any further information on this subject beyond that contained in the telegram to which I referred when answering his last Question.

British-Indians in the Transvaal.

MR. O'GRADY (Leeds, E.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to the case of four British-Indian boys who were punished as prohibited immigrants for entering the Transvaal with their parents, three to a fine of £15 or two months imprisonment and one to a fine of £5 or fourteen days hard labour; whether he is aware that three of the boys were ten, eleven, and twelve years of age and that they were all sent to gaol; and whether he can state the number of British-Indian children that have been sent to gaol for a similar offence.

COLONEL SEELY: No, Sir, but inquiry shall be made.

Shanghai Opium Conference.

MR. WATT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the British representatives to the Opium Conference in Shanghai are already in possession of strong views on the subjects to be discussed, and have committed themselves to these views in public; and, if so, will he say what useful purpose can be served by a Conference in the East if there is no member open to conversion.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I am not aware how far any of the British representatives have expressed themselves publicly on the subjects to be discussed at the Opium Conference; but as British delegates they will be guided at the Conference by the instructions which they will receive from His Majesty's Government, due regard being had to the state of facts brought as a whole before the Conference.

Disturbances in Hayti.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is in a position to give any further information as to the cause of the disturbances in Hayti, and the position of British subjects there.

SIR EDWARD GREY: No details as to the course of the present revolution in Hayti have been received by His Majesty's Government of later date than 30th November, when the insurgents were reported to be marching on the capital. No confirmation has been received of the reports in the Press that Port-au-Prince is now in the hands of the revolutionaries. H.M.S. "Scylla," was ordered on 30th November to proceed from St. Lucia to Port-au-Prince, where she was expected to arrive on the 2nd instant. The "Scylla" will, of course, give protection, if it is required, for British subjects in Hayti.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON: Has the right hon. Gentleman any information as to whether any troops have been landed there from the ships of any other Powers?

SIR EDWARD GREY: No, Sir. I have not heard that any troops have been landed except the crews of two American war vessels which have been there for some days.

The Lado Enclave.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if the wholesale destruction of the elephants in the Lado enclave will give rise to claim for waste and damage to that territory on the termination of the lease to His Majesty the King of the Belgians.

SIR EDWARD GREY: In the event of any proceedings which are likely to injure the leased territory permanently, representations will be made at Brussels.

Destruction of African Wild Game.

MR. FELL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if the Soudan Government have made regulations respecting the destruction of wild game in the Soudan; and if that Government can prevent the export through the Soudan of the proceeds of unauthorised destruction of such game in territories at present outside the Soudan but coming within the provisions of the International African Game Convention.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Government of the Soudan have issued regulations for carrying out the stipulations of the International Game Convention of 19th May, 1900. I am not aware whether the Government of the Soudan possess the power referred to in the second paragraph of the Question, but I will make inquiries.

MR. FELL: If the Government of the Soudan has power to carry out the Convention, would it not follow that it has the power suggested in the Question?

SIR EDWARD GREY: That is what I wish to ask about.

Colonel Liakhoff's Position at Teheran.

MR. LYNCH (Yorkshire, W.R., Ripon): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to a statement recently made by the Russian Minister in Teheran to the effect that Colonel Liakhoff had been acting under the orders of the Russian Minister of War, directions being sent to him by the military government of the Caucasus; and whether he is now prepared to modify the Answer given to the hon. Member for the Ripon division, and repeated in effect on subsequent occasions, that this Russian officer in Persian employ was acting independently of the Russian Government.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I have noticed the report in the Press of an alleged interview with the Russian Minister in Teheran; but even if the statements imputed to the latter are authentic I see no reason to modify the reply given to the hon. Member with regard to Colonel Liakhoff's action in the coup d'état in the summer.

British Ports.

MR. VERNEY (Buckinghamshire, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can furnish information, in a tabular form, for purposes of comparison, showing the increase in the last twenty years of the numbers, tonnage, and draft of individual ships making use of the Port of London and of the other principal British and Continental ports, differentiating steam and sailing ships.

The following Questions also appeared on the Paper in the name of the hon. Gentleman:—

To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can lay before the House of Commons proposals made by local bodies in England for improving in the near future waterways, harbours, and docks for the better accommodation of ships of large size and of heavy draft, showing the amount of expenditure proposed and the objects for which the expenditure is intended; and similar information respecting the proposed improvements to be undertaken either by central or local governments in the rivers, ports, and docks of Continental countries.

To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can furnish to the House of Commons in a tabular form statistics showing the expenditure during recent years on the principal ports and docks, including the Port of London, at home, and on the Continent of Europe, and the result of such expenditure in regard to the increase of accommodation for ships, whether in docks or alongside of quays, or in deepening waterways; whether further information can be given showing the depths at high and low tide during spring and neap tides at the entrances to the various docks situated on the River Thames, and of the shallower parts of the waterways leading to those docks; and whether, for the purposes of comparison, similar information can be given in regard to the chief Continental rivers, ports and docks.

To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any record is kept of the demurrage caused to ships of heavy draft making use of the Port of London by reason of shallow waterways in the River Thames at low tide; if so, whether he will give to the House of Commons information showing to what extent demurrage has occurred during recent years; and, if there is no such record, will it be possible to take steps for keeping such a record in future.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. CHURCHILL, Dundee): If my hon. friend after conferring with the officials at the Board of Trade will move for a Return giving in a suitable form such of the desired particulars as can be furnished or readily obtained by the Department, I will endeavour to meet his wishes so far as practicable, but I ought to warn him that the work of the Department is very heavy at this season of the year, that the preparation of such a Return will take a considerable time, and that it could not possibly be ready during the present session. Meanwhile he will find a good deal of information bearing on the subjects in which he is interested in certain publications of which I am sending him a list.

Political Contributions by Railway Companies.

MR. WARDLE (Stockport): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the contribution of railway companies for 1907 to ratepayers' associations and municipal alliances amounting to £336 19s. 9d., to labour protection associations £35, to the free labour association £341 13s.; and whether he intends to take action, under Section 17 of the Act of 1844, to restrain these companies from making these contributions.

MR. CHURCHILL: I am aware that the amounts mentioned by the hon. Member were contributed by certain railway companies during 1907, but I do not think that I could usefully take any action in the matter under the statutory provision referred to.

Illegal Insurance Policies.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade with reference to the Circulars which he recently issued to insurance companies and friendly societies on the subject of illegal policies, whether he has received any assurances from any of the companies or societies that the practices complained of have been definitely abandoned, or whether he has reason to believe that the warning has been absolutely ignored.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Circular issued by the Board of Trade to insurance companies did not ask for a reply, but replies have been received from a large number of companies. From the nature of these replies I may say that the companies either intimated that their practice was in accordance with the views expressed in the Circular, or that their agents would be instructed in the terms thereof, or that due consideration would be given thereto. As regards the Circular issued by the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies to friendly collecting societies I am informed that the societies generally have warned their collectors not to issue policies which are not in accordance with law.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: Has it not come to the knowledge of the Board of Trade officials that the companies chiefly complained of are to-day still carrying on the very practice of issuing policies on lives in which the person paying has no insurable interest?

MR. CHURCHILL: No, Sir.

Port of Liverpool.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any record is kept of the demurrage caused to ships of heavy draft making use of the Port of Liverpool by reason of shallow waterways in the River Mersey at low tide; if so, whether he will give to the House of Commons information showing to what extent demurrage has occurred during recent years; and, if there is no such record, will it be possible to take steps for keeping such a record in future.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board inform me that they have not received any complaints that ships of heavy draft have been delayed in the Port of Liverpool owing to insufficient depth of water. They think it can hardly be said that there are any shallow waterways in the River Mersey at Liverpool, inasmuch as since 1890 the Dock Board have dredged the Mersey Bar so that now there are twenty-eight to twenty-nine feet of water at low water of ordinary spring tides, while in the anchorage ground between the Seaforth Battery to the north and Rock Ferry Pier to the south there is a depth of from forty to seventy-eight feet at low water of ordinary spring tides. In these circumstances the necessity for keeping such a record hardly appears to arise.

North Ronaldshay Lighthouse.

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has received the account of the total wreck of the "Isle of Erin," and the loss of many valuable lives, given by the lighthouse-keeper, North Ronaldshay, Orkney, suggesting that if there had been telegraphic communication the ship and crew might have been saved; and if, in view of the fact that no portion of His Majesty's Dominions containing such a population is so disadvantageously situated as regards communication with the outside world, he will confer with the Post Office and Scottish Office with the object of extending the telegraph to North Ronaldshay.

MR. CHURCHILL: I have seen a newspaper extract containing a letter sent to the owner of this vessel by the lighthouse-keeper at North Ronaldshay, and I have received a letter from the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses urging the desirability of telegraphic communication between the island and the mainland. I have ordered an inquiry into the circumstances which attended the presumed loss of the vessel, and the lack of such communication will, no doubt, form one of the points to which the attention of the Court will be directed. His Majesty's Government will give their most careful consideration to any recommendation which may be made by the Court as well as to that of the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses.

Colonial Tariffs.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is able to state what fiscal advantages are now given in the Colonial possessions of France, Germany, Spain, the Netherlands, and the United States to goods imported from the Mother Country over goods imported from foreign countries, and what advantages are in return conceded by the same countries to goods imported from their own Colonies instead of from other countries; and if he will cause a Return to be prepared on this subject, in continuation of Commercial Paper, No. 5, of Session 1895.

MR. CHURCHILL: I would refer the hon. Member to Memorandum No. XI., included in the first volume of Memoranda relating to British and Foreign Trade and Industrial Conditions (Cd. 1761 of 1903). The only change in this matter which has since taken place is in regard to the treatment in Spain of the products of Fernando Po and other Spanish possessions in Africa and vice versa. The list of articles the produce of these Colonies which are exempted from duty on importation into Spain has been somewhat extended whilst Spanish goods imported into these Colonies now enjoy preferential treatment only if imported under the Spanish flag. If the hon. Member, after considering the information given in the Memorandum referred to, requires fuller details on the subject, and will move for a Return, I will see what can be done to furnish him with the information he desires.

British Magazines for Canada.

MR. KING (Cheshire, Knutsford): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he can give any figures to show the increase in the postage of British magazines to Canada since the reduction in the postal rate in such articles.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I am glad to say that the Canadian magazine post instituted last May is fully realising the objects for which it was instituted. It has led to a remarkable increase in the number of British magazines, periodicals, and trade journals sent from the United Kingdom to Canada. It is estimated that the increase in the yearly number of British publications sent to the Dominion is some six millions per annum. I am, moreover, informed, on good authority, that the increase has been greatest in the case of magazines of high class. This is, I think, not the least satisfactory feature of the new post.

Christmas Pay in the Post Office.

MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether the men employed at the Post Offices of Leicester, Birmingham, Liverpool, and Birkenhead to meet the Christmas pressure are, under the new order he has issued, to be paid less per hour than in former years; and whether he would state the pay this year and that of last year at these offices.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I beg to refer my hon. friend to my Answer to his Question on the 23rd ultimo with regard to the general basis upon which the rates for the Christmas casual force in the different districts have been fixed. In most cases the payments are increased. I am sending him a statement of the rates paid in 1907, and those to be paid this year at the particular offices to which he refers.

Telephone Communication in Gloucestershire.

MR. ESSEX (Gloucestershire, Cirencester): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the inhabitants of Naunton, Upper Slaughter, and Lower Slaughter, and the surrounding country in the County of Gloucester, are wholly without telegraphic communication; whether he will at once proceed to give such facilities to these districts; and whether, if he gives such communication, he will consult the local councils as to the routes to be chosen for his wires so as to do as little hurt to the beauty of these places as may be.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I have recently authorised an extension of the telegraph system to the village of Upper Slaughter, which is only about three-quarters of a mile from Lower Slaughter. Telegraph offices at both villages would not be warranted, and Upper Slaughter appears to be the better centre. A local landowner and the local authorities concerned have granted the wayleave required, so that I may assume that the route chosen is satisfactory to them. A telegraph office at Naunton was offered under guarantee three years ago, and I am prepared to renew the offer if desired.

The New Education Bill.

MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been drawn to the case of the teachers likely to lose their situations under the system of transfers proposed in the Education Bill; and whether, in view of the limited powers of private Members with regard to any Amendment suitable to this case, he will cause to be put down on behalf of the Government an Amendment or new clause, such as will give the House an opportunity of doing justice in the matter before the Committee stage is closed.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury): My right hon. friend has asked me to reply to this Question. It is impossible to say what is covered by the sentence in the right hon. Gentleman's Question, "teachers likely to lose their situations under the system of transfers proposed in the Education Bill." But I am considering carefully some proposals which have been presented to me on behalf of the teachers, and I will be in a position to make a statement on the matter on Clause 8 or on some other suitable occasion.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether the exception at the end of subsection (3) of Clause 1 of the Education (No. 2) Bill applies to the case of a prosecution under bye-laws of the local education authority, or whether it applies only to the case of an attendance order under Sections 4 and 11 of the Elementary Education Act, 1876.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The exception (with respect to the schools selected by the parent) applies only to attendance orders, and is not applicable to prosecutions under bye-laws.

Co-operative Societies and Small Holdings.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if he will state the extent of the land which each of the four co-operative societies has acquired from the county councils; and whether the land so acquired is by purchase or hire; if the latter, for how many years is the land hired, if the former, what price per acre have the societies agreed to pay.

MR. FULLER (Wiltshire, Westbury: for Sir EDWARD STRACHEY): The following table gives the information for which the right hon. Member asks—

County.	Co-operative Society.	Area of land let to the Society.			Terms of lease under which the Society have hired the land.	Average rent per acre agreed to be paid by the Society.
		a.	r.	p.	Years.	s.	d.

English Agricultural Grant.

MR. ESSEX: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, what is the total sum allocated by the Board of Agriculture from the last Vote for the promotion of the interests of English agriculture.

MR. FULLER: Of the net expenditure of the Board during the year ended 31st March, 1908, the amount allocated to England and Wales was approximately £123,000, of which about £8,000 was expended on matters connected with the fishing industry.

American Gooseberry Mildew.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether there have been outbreaks of American gooseberry-mildew notified from Sussex and Bedfordshire; and, if so, whether the Board intend to issue an order scheduling these counties under the Insect Pests Act.

MR. FULLER: An outbreak of American gooseberry-mildew has been discovered by one of the Board's inspectors in Sussex. As the occupier of the premises is adopting the measures required by the Board, and as this disease does not spread during the winter months, a special order for the county is unnecessary for the present. The Board have no official information as to an outbreak in Bedfordshire.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye): What grounds have the Board for saying the disease does not spread during the winter months?

MR. FULLER: I will inquire.

Inspectors under the Insects and Pests Act.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, how many counties have appointed inspectors, and in what numbers, under the Insects and Pests Act; and whether, in all cases of such appointments, efficient expert inspectors have been selected.

MR. FULLER: According to the information of the Board one expert inspector has been appointed by each of the following local authorities:—Gloucestershire, Worcestershire, Herefordshire, Warwickshire, Leicestershire, Derbyshire, Norfolk, the Isle of Ely, Huntingdonshire, Cambridgeshire, and two by the Kent County Council. In Essex no expert inspector has, so far as the Board are aware, been appointed, but police officers have been appointed to carry out the work.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY: Who looks after the inspection in the counties of Surrey and Sussex?

MR. FULLER: I will inquire.

Carnarvon Farmers' Association.

MR. ELLIS DAVIES (Carnarvonshire, ion): I beg to ask the hon. Member South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether, in reply to an application from the Carnarvon Farmers' Association for grant for the purpose of improving the breed of cattle, the Board informed him that they had no fund for the purpose; and whether, in view of the fact that the country's meat supply now depends largely on foreign cattle, the Board will reconsider the question.

MR. FULLER: The reply to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative. The Board as at present advised are not satisfied that any action on the lines suggested is necessary.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): Are there any funds available for the improvement of cattle-breeding either in this country or in Ireland?

MR. FULLER: I cannot say.

MR. WATT: Will the hon. Gentleman introduce legislation in order to provide funds?

MR. FULLER: No, Sir, I can make no such promise.

The Spraying of Fruit Trees.

MR. COURTHOPE: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether the Board of Agriculture will issue a leaflet dealing with the regulations for the spraying of fruit-trees now in force in British Columbia and with the mixtures used for spraying in that country.

MR. FULLER: The Board have issued numerous leaflets dealing with the spraying of fruit crops but they do not think that any useful purpose would be served by the issue of one on the lines suggested, and they are not able, therefore, to adopt the hon. Member's suggestion.

MR. COURTHOPE: Are the Board aware that in British Columbia the growers years ago gave up the system recommended now?

MR. FULLER: The hon. Gentleman must remember the difficulty arising from the difference of climatic conditions.

Fruit Tree Pests.

MR. COURTHOPE: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether the Board have considered or will consider the regulations enforced in British Columbia and other fruit-growing Colonies for the destruction and prevention of fungus and insect pests, with a view to adopting similar regulations in this country.

MR. FULLER: The Board have carefully studied the regulations to which the hon. Member refers. In preparing regulations suited to the particular conditions of this country it is their practice to make such use as may seem desirable of regulations based upon the experience of other countries.

Ecclesiastical Commissioners and Small Holdings.

MR. ROGERS (Wiltshire, Devizes): I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Crewe Division, as Ecclesiastical Commissioner, whether the first offer of all vacant farms the property of the Commissioners will, in future, be given to the small holdings committee of the county in which they are situate.

MR. TOMKINSON (Cheshire, Crewe): The Commissioners' practice has been and is to endeavour to utilise for small holdings and allotments all vacant farms which in their opinion are at all suitable for that purpose. They have also, since the Act, endeavoured by arrangement with their tenants to provide land when it is required for small holdings or allotments in localities where they have no vacant farms. A large number of small holdings and allotments have been and are being thus provided, in some cases by lettings to county and parish councils, and in others by direct lettings to the applicants.

MR. ROGERS: What proportion of the quarter-million acres owned by the Commissioners has been dealt with in this way ?

MR. TOMKINSON : I cannot reply to that definitely, but I can inform the hon. Member that in and since 1906, forty-seven new lettings have been effected for small holdings and allotments comprising 1,606 acres upon the Commissioners' estates, the tenants being in twenty cases local authorities, and in the remaining twenty-seven cases individual tenants or bodies of tenants, in some cases very numerous. In addition there are now under consideration twenty-seven offers of, or applications which they expect to satisfy for land for the same purposes amounting to 1,430 acres. Quite recently 87 a. 1r. 3lp. of land at Tarvin (Cheshire) has been sold by the Commissioners to the Cheshire County Council for this purpose.

MR. WINFREY (Norfolk, S.W.) : And in how many cases has there been an increase of rents to small holders as compared with previous rents ?

MR. TOMKINSON : I must have notice of that Question. Personally, I have no knowledge of any case.

Sheriff-Substitutes

MR. WATT : I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he will say how many solicitors have been appointed in Scotland to the positions of sheriff-substitutes; during how many years has it been open to solicitors to be so appointed; and whether in view of the facts that solicitors are drawn from all classes of society and are many in number, whereas advocates are drawn from the wealthy classes and are few in number, he will in future appointments give preference to the solicitor's branch of the profession.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. THOMAS SHAW, Hawick, Burghs) : As the office of sheriff-substitute has been open to all branches of the legal profession since the year 1825, when a legal qualification was first required and appointments to the office were for over fifty years made by the sheriffs-depute, I cannot give my hon. friend the information he desires in the first part of the Question. As regards the latter part I do not think it would be in the interests of the public service to discriminate between branches of the legal profession in the sense suggested by my hon. friend.

MR. WATT : Has the right hon. Gentleman appointed any solicitors to these posts since he has been in office, and will he in future see that the solicitors, who constitute the larger branch of the service, get their proper share ?

MR. THOMAS SHAW : The Answer to the next Question covers that, I think.

MR. PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.) : I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he can say how many appointments to the office of sheriff-substitute have been made since the nominations to such office rested with him; and if he will give the names and callings of those so appointed and the places of appointment.

MR. THOMAS SHAW : In the period referred to there have been six such appointments. Of those appointed one was an advocate and King's Counsel, the other five were advocates. If my hon. friend desires it I shall be glad to furnish him with a list of the names of the gentlemen appointed, the dates of appointment and the sheriff-substituteships referred to.

Depute Sheriff Clerks

MR. SUTHERLAND (Elgin Burghs) : I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that, at a meeting on the 4th instant, the sheriffs-principal of Scotland were unanimously of opinion that better provision should be made in regard to the tenure of office, appointment, and remuneration of depute sheriff clerks; whether he will deal with the matter in the Summary Jurisdiction Bill; and, if not, what steps he proposes taking in order to secure to depute sheriff clerks an improvement and more certain permanency in their official appointments.

MR. THOMAS SHAW : An excerpt from a minute of meeting of the sheriffs of Scotland has been sent to me. It contains a number of suggestions with regard to the deputed to the sheriff clerks, very justly distinguishing between their various positions and, while generally favouring better provision, suggests guarantees as to suitability, criticises the depute sheriff clerks' proposals and indicates that safeguards might be provided by the approval of the sheriffs themselves. The matter is not within the scope of the Summary Jurisdiction Bill. There is a likelihood of a Commission or Committee being appointed to consider various points as to minor legal appointments in Scotland and I am favourably disposed to have this matter, including the suggestions made by the sheriffs, some of which are novel, brought into the scope of the inquiry.

Dunleer Allotments.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Estates Commissioners fixed 1st November last as the date on which they would announce to whom allotments would be made of land in their hands for that purpose in Dunleer, County Louth, and that so far nothing has been done; whether he is aware that discontent exists in the neighbourhood on account of the delay; and whether he will hasten the allocation of allotments, and take steps to ensure that no preferential treatment is accorded to nominees of the United Irish League.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): The Estates Commissioners inform me that they did not fix 1st November as the date for the allotment of these lands. The allotment will be made when the Commissioners have completed their arrangements for the resale of the lands.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer that part of the Question which deals with the preferential treatment accorded to nominees of the United Irish League?

MR. BIRRELL: No such preferential treatment is ever accorded.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Since when has that been the regulation?

MR. BIRRELL: From the beginning.

Mearscourt Estate, Westmeath.

SIR WALTER NUGENT (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if the Estates Commissioners have as yet compulsorily acquired, under the Evicted Tenants Act, that portion of the lands of Mearscourt, near Mayvore, County Westmeath, of which public notice was given on 15th August; and, if so, when Mrs. Wynn and Mrs. Winkel, the tenants evicted from that land, are likely to be reinstated.

MR. BIRRELL: The lands on the estate of General Devenish Meares, which the Estates Commissioners propose to acquire compulsorily under the Evicted Tenants Act, have been inspected, and the Commissioners hope to be in a position to make an offer for them at an early date. The Commissioners are not in a position, at this stage of the proceedings, to say when the lands will be acquired or the evicted tenants reinstated.

State Purchase of Irish Railways.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has asked Mr. Gerald Balfour if, when Chief Secretary for Ireland, he asked Mr. Thomas Robertson, then Chairman of the Board of Works (Ireland), for estimates, first of the cost of purchase of the railways of Ireland by the State, and, secondly, of the cost of guaranteeing dividends by an arrangement securing the control of the Government; and, if so, whether he can state the estimate in each case.

MR. BIRRELL: As I have already stated, there is no record, either in the Irish Office or in the Office of Public Works, of any such estimate having been asked for or received. If Mr. Gerald Balfour received such an estimate, he must, I presume, have obtained it for his personal information. I do not think it would be regular that I should address any inquiries on the subject to Mr. Balfour. I will, however, send him a copy of this Answer.

Fuge Estate, Cork.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates

Commissioners have yet made any definite offer of purchase of the untenanted lands of Garryduff and Gurrane on the Fuge estate near Kilbrin, County Cork, and for the purchase of the demesne lands at Templemary, near Buttevant, with a view to the reinstatement of evicted tenants and the enlargement of uneconomic holdings, if so, with what result; and whether, in the event of the acquisition of these lands or portion thereof, the Commissioners will take all possible steps to give a preference in the occupation thereof to the families who formerly occupied and tilled them or to their representatives.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners have published in the Dublin Gazette a notice of their intention to acquire the lands of Garryduff and Gurrane compulsorily under the Evicted Tenants Act, and have had the lands inspected with a view to making an offer for them. If acquired, the lands will be utilised to provide holdings for the classes of persons mentioned in the Act. No formal proceedings are pending before the Commissioners with regard to the demesne lands at Templemary, but the Commissioners have had an inspection made, and will intimate to the owner the price which they are prepared to advance if proceedings for sale are instituted. It is not possible to make any statement, at this stage, as regards the allotment of these lands if acquired.

Edenderry Labourers' Cottage Scheme.

MR. SHEEHY (Meath, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the case of the application of two labourers for a house and acre and an additional half-acre in No. 3 district council of Edenderry by Mr. Hope and Mr. Durnan, being granted by the inspector, Mr. Fitzpatrick, and the landlord, Mr. Langan, having appealed to the Local Government Board, a second inquiry was held by another inspector, Mr. Kelly, who decided against the applications; on what grounds was Mr. Kelly's decision upheld and Mr. Fitzpatrick's rejected; and how much land has Mr. Langan in his possession.

MR. BIRRELL: The facts are as stated in the Question. The further inquiry held by Mr. Kelly was ordered by the Local Government Board in pursuance of section 6 (4) (b), of the Labourers (Ireland) Act, 1906, the owner having presented a petition to the Board against the order made by Mr. Fitzpatrick. The Board, on consideration of Mr. Kelly's report and all the evidence, decided to accede to the petition in the two cases referred to. The grounds of objection relied upon by the petitioner, Mr. Langan, were set forth in his petition, copy of which was sent to the rural district council prior to the further inquiry. The Board are unable to say definitely what quantity of land Mr. Langan has in his possession, as he holds more than one farm. I understand that another appeal presented by him at the same time was disallowed.

Waterville Lake Fishing Industry.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that representations have been made by those engaged in the lake-fishing industry at Waterville, County Kerry, against the system lately practised of putting down the weir during the close season for the purpose of capturing spawning fish for the hatchery; and whether, in view of the opinion held locally that fish thus handled will not take a fly or bait in the following season, he will have inquiries made with a view to allowing a free passage for spring salmon in the Waterville River and safeguarding the interests of at least 100 persons whose means of livelihood is being seriously jeopardised.

MR. BIRRELL: The Answer to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative. I am assured that there is no foundation for the belief that the handling of salmon at a weir interferes with their subsequent susceptibility to capture by angling. The weir is fished under proper supervision, and all clean fish are passed over the weir without injury. It would be impossible to stock the hatchery without fishing the weir.

Caldbeck Estate, Queen's County.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what the cause of the delay in making the national distribution of the untenanted land on the Caldbeck estate, Ballacolla, Queen's County; whether the Estates Commissioners have approved of the allotments made by their inspector, Mr. Booth, in which the bailiff of the estate and a wealthy merchant in Ballacolla, who also keeps the post office, are apportioned two of the largest holdings in the untenanted land, to the exclusion of the small holders in the locality; and can he say when the inspector proposes again visiting Ballacolla.

MR. BIRRELL: The allotment of the untenanted land cannot be made by the Commissioners until their formal proposal to purchase has been accepted by the owner, and this proposal cannot issue until title has been proved. The Commissioners cannot say when their inspector will again visit Ballacolla.

Irish Landlords' Sporting Rights.

MR. MEAGHER (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in the case of tenants who have purchased under the Land Purchase Act of 1903, and in which purchase sporting rights have been reserved to the landlord, such reservation will give the landlord the right of taking any persons he likes along with him over the grounds of the tenants without his having first received permission from the tenants to take such persons with him.

MR. BIRRELL: The answer is in the affirmative. I would refer the hon. Member to subsection (4) of Section 13 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, which expressly empowers the landlord to authorise any persons to exercise the right of sporting.

Warning to Nationalist Newspapers.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is now in a position to state that, as a result of the warning given to certain newspapers against the publication of intimidatory resolutions of the United Irish League, there has been any material diminution or increase in the number of such resolutions published.

MR. BIRRELL: I understand that there has been some diminution recently in the publication of these notices. The Law Officers have under consideration some cases in which the warning has produced no effect.

Poor Law Reform (Ireland) Bill.

MR. MEAGHER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland on what day he intends introducing the Poor Law Reform (Ireland) Bill; whether it is the intention of the Government to adopt the recommendations of the Vice-Regal Commission as the basis of the Bill; and whether he has entrusted the preparation of the Bill to persons who have practical experience of the working and administration of the Irish Poor Laws.

MR. BIRRELL: The Royal Commission on the Poor Laws and Relief of Distress is expected to report before the end of the year, when the whole question of Poor Law reform will have to be considered. The recommendations of the Vice-Regal Commission generally will form the basis of legislation for Ireland, but it remains to be seen how far the Royal Commission may adopt similar recommendations. I cannot yet say at what date it will be possible to introduce a Bill on the subject. The Irish Government, will, of course, have the assistance of its most experienced officers in the preparation of the Bill.

Irish Workhouse Teachers' Salaries.

MR. MEAGHER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the salaries of teachers in Irish workhouses, though being paid in the first instance from the local rates, are subsequently refunded by the Government to the local authorities; and, if so, whether he can see his way to have this class of teachers included for a share in the supplementary grant in aid of National teachers.

MR. BIRRELL: The answer to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative. As regards the second part of the Question, the supplementary grant of July last was in aid of the Vote for public education. No charge in respect of the salaries of teachers of Poor Law union schools has ever been borne on that Vote.

Irish Local Government Auditors.

MR. MEAGHER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the new rule made by the Irish Local Government Board with reference to the appointment of auditors will have the effect of debarring Poor Law officers from ever being promoted to these positions; and whether, if that be so, such a rule is against the principles of promotion in all public services.

MR. BIRRELL: Poor Law officers are not debarred from being appointed auditors if they possess the prescribed qualifications. These qualifications are held to be necessary to enable the auditors to perform their duties efficiently.

Ballyscullion Police Hut.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the intention of the police authorities to discontinue the police hut or barrack at Ballyscullion, near Toomebridge, County Antrim; and, if so, on what grounds.

MR. BIRRELL: The question of discontinuing this police hut is under consideration.

Illicit Distillation in County Antrim.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland how many prosecutions for illicit distilling and how many convictions there have been at Toome, in County Antrim, during the last five years.

MR. BIRRELL: The Inspector-General of the Royal Irish Constabulary informs me that there has been no conviction or prosecution for illicit distillation in the Toome Petty Sessions district during the past five years.

Alleged Malicious Burning at Knockmay.

MR. PATRICK MEEHAN (Queen's County, Leix): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a youth named Thompson has been returned for trial on a charge of perjury in connection with the alleged malicious burning at Knockmay, Queen's County; whether the county-inspector, with the knowledge that Thompson's statement was false, ordered his statement to be taken on oath with the object of obtaining warrants to arrest three men who had been proved innocent; whether an inquiry will be held into this officer's conduct; and whether it is part of a police officer's duty to order statements to be taken on oath which, as in this case, he knew had been deliberately concocted.

I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, on 24th July, at a special Court held at Maryborough a summons was issued by order of the presiding magistrate; that County-Inspector Sweedy retained the summons in his office; that the magistrates had to order the return of the summons; and can he say by what authority the county inspector refused to execute a legal order of a magistrate made in Court.

I beg further to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Sergeant Monahan received information of the alleged malicious burning at Knockmay, Queen's County, at 8.30 p.m. on 20th May last; whether he immediately reported the matter to his superior officer and visited the scene of the burning within an hour; that Sergeant Monahan has been censured and punished for alleged remissness in discharge of his duty; will he place the official Reports in this case upon the Table of the House or state in what particular Sergeant Monahan showed remissness in his duty; and whether there is any rule in the Police Code enabling a superior officer to punish men for an imaginary fault or through caprice.

MR. BIRRELL: As stated in my reply to a previous Question on this subject, asked by the hon. Member on the 25th ultimo, proceedings are pending against Joseph Thompson for perjury in connection with this case, and it is not therefore, desirable to enter into further particulars of the matter. I have nothing to add to my previous reply with regard to Sergeant Monahan. The official police reports are confidential documents, and it would be contrary to practice to lay them on the Table.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.) asked was the Chief Secretary aware that County-Inspector Tweedy had ordered Thompson's statement to be taken on oath although he was aware that the previous statement was false; and was not that suborning perjury, and was not Thompson insane?

MR. BIRRELL said he could not answer for Thompson's state of mind.

MR. DELANY asked did it not seem as if there were other Sergeant Sheridans in the police force.

[No Answer was returned.]

Land Purchase in Munster.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the average number of years purchase paid in each county of Munster under the Ashbourne and Balfour Acts, and the average number of years purchase paid under the Land Purchase Act, 1903; and whether Ashbourne purchasers who accepted an extension of time of repayment became entitled to decadal reductions of 10 per cent. or more at the end of the first ten years, another 10 per cent. or more at the end of twenty years, and a further reduction of more than 10 per cent. at the end of thirty years, thus making their average annual payment the same as if their annuity had been originally calculated at the rate of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.

MR. BIRRELL: The particulars of the average number of years purchase paid in each county in Munster under the various Land Purchase Acts have appeared from year to year in the Annual Reports of the Land Commission and of the Estates Commissioners, to which I would refer the hon. Member. A purchaser under the Land Purchase (Ireland) Act, 1885, who accepted decadal revisions, and whose annuity in each decade was actually and fully paid up, is liable to pay for each £100 advanced during the first decade, £4; during the second, £1 1s. 10d.; during the third, £3 4s. 6d.; and thereafter for forty-nine years, £2 17s. 11d. per annum. A purchaser under the Irish Land Act, 1903, is liable to pay £3 5s. for each £100 advanced throughout a period calculated to be sixty-eight and a half years. The systems are entirely different, and the average annuities can hardly be compared.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork): Is it not the fact that this decadal reduction was strongly recommended by the Land Conference, and strongly objected to in influential quarters in Ireland owing to the fact that it added 25 per cent. to the tenants' payment, and is it not also the case that at the old purchase rate it would take at least seventy years to make as many peasant proprietors as has been made in the last five years under the present Act?

MR. BIRRELL: I must have notice of a Question of that character.

MR. FLAVIN: Was not the deduction 10 per cent. for three periods of ten years under the Act of 1896, whereas the tenants now get a further reduction of 15 per cent.?

MR. BIRRELL: One can hardly thus discuss the respective merits of different schemes.

Holycross Disturbances.

MR. KENDAL O'BRIEN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether eight men, who had been arrested in their beds at two o'clock in the morning, at Holycross, County Tipperary, and charged with riot and unlawful assembly, were then taken to a police barrack and tried before a resident magistrate, no local justice being permitted to take part in the proceedings; whether eighteen men subsequently arrested were tried in the same way, and returned for trial at Cork Winter Assizes without the option of bail; whether it is the practice in other parts of the United Kingdom to exclude the public from trials of this kind and to take the evidence in police barracks before a removable magistrate; and will he state under what law these proceedings have been carried out.

MR. BIRRELL: These men have been returned for trial at the Cork Winter Assizes, and I understand that the trial is actually proceeding. In these circumstances it is undesirable to make any statement on the subject.

MR. BELLOC (Salford, S.): But surely this is a case for administrative action?

MR. BIRRELL: Pending the trial, I think I should abstain from answering these Questions.

AN HON. MEMBER: Is it the practice in England or Scotland for people to be taken into private buildings and tried by a magistrate without the option of defending themselves?

MR. BIRRELL: I daresay not.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: What is the object of arresting people between two and three in the morning? Why cannot the arrests be made at a reasonable hour?

MR. BIRRELL: I have done my best, being myself very much averse to interference with sleep, to get the arrests made at reasonable hours, but I rather gather the difficulty is that of finding these people at home.

Intermediate Education Inspectors.

MR. KETTLE (Tyrone, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now state how many new inspectorships are to be created by the Commissioners of Intermediate Education in Ireland; what will be the duties, powers, and emoluments of the inspectors; and how many women inspectors will be appointed.

MR. BIRRELL: The Commissioners of Intermediate Education have now been authorised to appoint six inspectors, and propose to exercise that power. They inform me that they do not intend to include women among the first six appointments. A statement of the powers, duties and emoluments of the inspectors cannot well be compressed within the limits of an oral reply, but I will communicate with the hon. Member on the subject.

MR. HAZLETON (Galway, N.): Have the Board given any reasons for not appointing any women inspectors among the first six?

MR. BIRRELL: I do not think they have. Everybody knows that this is a controversial subject, although I take the view that women should, as far as possible, be appointed to inspect girls' schools. Still, I cannot enforce my view on the Board.

MR. HAZLETON: Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Board for the reason?

MR. BIRRELL: Yes, I will.

MR. KETTLE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state whether certain memoranda were presented by persons connected with intermediate education in Ireland to the Commissioners of Intermediate Education demanding the appointment of men only to the new inspectorships; if so, by whom were these memoranda presented; and whether the Commissioners of Intermediate Education propose to entrust male inspectors with the duty of inspecting girls' schools.

MR. BIRRELL: The Commissioners of Intermediate Education inform me that they have received no demand such as is referred to in the Question. A communication has been received from the principal of one of the leading girls' intermediate schools in Ireland expressing great satisfaction that men only are to be appointed inspectors at first. The Board propose to entrust male inspectors with the duty of inspecting girls' schools. The Board have already for two years entrusted temporary male inspectors with the inspection of girls' schools, and for the past six years the inspection of all girls' schools in connection with the various courses of the Board's programme (domestic economy alone accepted) has been carried on by male inspectors. The Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction. No objection has been received from the authorities of the girls schools to either of these cases of inspection by men.

Firearms in Ireland.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received information of a case of shooting at a herdman at Ballyogan, County Clare, on Saturday; and whether anyone has been arrested.

MR. BIRRELL: On the occasion in question, the herdman, accompanied by a constable who was protecting him, was driving some cattle to water when four shots were fired from a thick hazel cover. The herdman was struck with the grain of shot under the right eye. Subsequent examination showed that an ambush with retreats had been carefully prepared in the cover. The person or persons who fired the shots were thus enabled to escape, and no arrests have been made.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Has the right hon. Gentleman taken any precautions to see that firearms do not fall into the hands of irresponsible persons?

MR. BIRRELL: I do not think that we have now any power.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Will the right hon. Gentleman legislate for power to prevent firearms falling into the hands of irresponsible persons?

MR. BIRRELL: The hon. Gentleman knows that it is exceedingly difficult in Ireland, or in any other country, to keep firearms out of the hands of people who want to obtain them.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG: Is it not the fact that there was no difficulty whatever before the right hon. Gentleman repealed the Act?

MR. FLAVIN: Can the right hon. Gentleman give the House the number of revolvers in the possession of Orangemen in the North of Ireland, and how many shots are fired?

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice should be given of that.

MR. FLAVIN: I speak from personal experience.

Attack on Gurteen Police Patrol.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is in a position to give particulars of the attack made upon a police patrol at Gurteen, County Galway, on Saturday night, by a party of armed men in ambush; what injuries were inflicted upon the police; and how many arrests were made.

MR. BIRRELL: Two arrests were made in this case, and the prisoners have been returned for trial. The case is, therefore, sub judice, and it is not desirable to enter into particulars.

Irish Education Grant.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether it has been stated that the recent grant of £114,000 was to be shared among all the national teachers in Ireland; and, if so, can he state why the workhouse teachers who are subject to the same rules as to classification and training, and who must teach the same subjects as ordinary national teachers, have received no share of this grant.

MR. BIRRELL: No provision was made for the teachers of workhouse schools in connection with the supplementary grant of 24th July last. As stated in my reply to a Question asked by the hon. Member for West Belfast on 29th July last no charge in respect of the salaries of teachers of these schools has ever been borne on the Vote for public education. Such teachers are in the service of the boards of guardians.

Sales under the 1903 Land Act.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state when exactly in the normal course of a sale under the 1903 Land Act the Estates Commissioners give their decision as to whether or not the property proposed to be dealt with is an estate, distinguishing, if necessary, between direct and indirect sales; whether there has been any change in this practice; and, if so, when.

MR. BIRRELL: Having regard to the decision in the case of Weir's estate, the Commissioners do not now provisionally declare lands to be an estate. The declaration is made when the Commissioners have completed their inquiries and before the lands are vested in the tenants, and the purchase money advanced.

Ormaithwaite Evicted Tenants.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what is the cause of the delay in reinstating Thomas Walsh and the other evicted tenants on the Ormaithwaite property in North Kerry; whether compulsory powers have been taken by the Estate Commissioners for their reinstatement; and, if so, with what result.

MR. BIRRELL: In this case, the owner has lodged a petition praying that the lands be not compulsorily acquired at the price offered without further inquiry. Judgment has not yet been delivered in the matter.

MR. FLAVIN: Seeing that these tenants have now been out sixteen years, is it not time they were reinstated?

MR. BIRRELL: The land cannot be compulsorily acquired until judgment has been delivered.

MR. FLAVIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the receiver of this particular estate in London told me this tenant would never put his foot inside the evicted holding?

MR. BIRRELL: I cannot say anything as to that.

Ardfert Estate, North Kerry.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. Linsey Talbot Crosbie, of Ardfert, has sold his estate in North Kerry to the tenants; whether the Estates Commissioners were aware that when the estate was being sold that Mr. Crosbie had in his possession, outside of his demesne land, nearly 400 acres of grazing land; and whether the Estates Commissioners sanctioned the sale of the tenanted land without acquiring the grazing land for the enlargement of uneconomic holdings on the estate.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners inform me that the tenanted portion of this estate was purchased and vested in the tenants in 1906. The owner applied to be allowed to re-purchase some 850 acres of demesne and other lands in his own occupation, but this was not sanctioned. He has since arranged to sell over 300 acres to persons coming within Section 2 of the Irish Land Act, 1903.

MR. FLAVIN: Have the Estates Commissioners acquired this estate at their own price, and do they intend to divide it themselves?

MR. BIRRELL: I must have notice of that.

MR. FLAVIN: Will the right hon. Gentleman make representations to them to take care in dividing the land to bear in mind the needs of the poor people of the neighbourhood?

MR. BIRRELL: That is one of the objects of acquiring the estate.

MR. FLAVIN: But it is not done.

Cavan and Leitrim Railway.

MR. F. MEEHAN (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a copy of resolutions passed at a meeting of district councillors representing the ratepayers in the guaranteeing area for the Cavan and Leitrim Railway, held at Keshcarrigan, in the county of Leitrim, on 3rd October, 1908; and whether, having regard to the facts contained therein and the grievances of the ratepayers of those districts, he will grant a sworn inquiry into the management and working of the said railway since it was opened for traffic.

MR. BIRRELL: The resolutions referred to were received on 30th November. The Irish Government are in correspondence with the Board of Works on the subject.

Dundrum Bay Fisheries.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture (Ireland) whether he is aware that illegal trawling and trammel-net fishing is being extensively carried on in Dundrum Bay, County Down, to the detriment of the line fishermen of Newcastle and other villages on that coast; and will he say what steps his Department intend to take to put a stop to it.

MR. BIRRELL: My hon. friend has asked me to reply to the Questions addressed to him to-day. As regards illegal trawling in Dundrum Bay, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply just given to a Question asked by the hon. Member for South Down†. The use of trammel-nets during the day is, in the absence of a bye-law, illegal. From some cause the fishermen have been under the impression that the practice was legal in Dundrum Bay. The Department are about to submit a bye-law making the use of these engines legal during the day in the place in question, and meantime they have felt hesitation in directing that prosecutions should be instituted against persons for following a practice which has been many years in operation.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Has the Fishery Board steamer for the protection of fisheries patrolled this portion of the coast for the last five years?

MR. BIRRELL: I will inquire.

Irish Trade Frauds.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture (Ireland) in reference to his statement at the Council meeting of the 24th instant that the Department intend to increase the number of inspectors with a view to the detection of fraud and adulteration practised by traders in Great Britain to the detriment of Irish manufacturers and producers, whether he will consider the advisability of appointing one or more qualified lady inspectors in connection with the lace, crochet, and textile industries of Ireland.

MR. BIRRELL: The statement made at the meeting of the Council of Agriculture was to the effect that during the past six months the staff employed by the Department in Great Britain, for the detection of frauds had been increased by three assistants, and that a linen expert already in the Department's service had been detailed to deal specially with the question of frauds in linen goods. It is not proposed further to increase the staff at present. The Department have in their employment a lady inspector who is qualified to give expert evidence on samples of crochet, lace and other work of the kind.

MR. FLYNN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that it was largely owing to inspection by a lady that huge frauds in connection with Irish lace were detected in London and a heavy fine inflicted on the offender?

MR. BIRRELL: I will communicate that lamentable fact to the Vice-President.

Irish Agricultural Grant.

MR. ESSEX: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture (Ireland) how much of the last Vote granted to the Board of Agriculture and Technical Education (Ireland) was devoted to the sole furtherance of Irish agricultural interests.

MR. BIRRELL: If the hon. Member is referring to the Department's Endowment Fund, established under Sections 15 and 16 of the Agriculture and Technical Instruction (Ireland) Act, 1899, the present to state what amount thereof is solely devoted to those interests.

The Gurteen Disturbances.

MR. JOHN ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. Martin Finnerty, of Gurteen, County Galway, was arrested on Sunday last charged with a serious offence, and on yesterday returned for trial to Limerick Assizes which were then proceeding, and if Mr. Finnerty's trial is forced on by the Crown will he not be deprived of reasonable opportunity to prepare his defence.

MR. BIRRELL: Martin Finnerty was, as I am informed, returned for trial in custody to the next Assizes for the County of Galway, but as the commission for the Winter Assizes is one of gaol delivery, I am advised that he must be brought up before the Judge presiding at Limerick Winter Assizes, and that any other course would be a violation of the law. It will be open to him to make any application for the postponement of his trial which he may be advised to make, and such application and the grounds of it will no doubt be fully considered by the Judge.

MR. JOHN ROCHE further asked if on the previous day at Limerick thirty-one jurors were not ordered to stand aside by the Crown, and was not that a violation of the pledge given by the Attorney-General for Ireland?

LAKER: Order, order. Notice given in the usual way. The ought, under the Standing have been submitted to me be asked in this way.

Stationery Office Contracts.

ORGE ROBERTS (Norwich): Is the First Lord of the Treasury in a position to attach to tenders for book-work printing for the Irish Office, that the contract must be executed in the City of Dublin; if so, what are the reasons for such stipulation, and whether he will consider the expediency of allowing other Irish firms to compete for Government printing.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HOBHOUSE, Bristol, E.): I am informed that of the seven book-work printing contracts made by the Stationery Office in Ireland five must be executed in Dublin. This restriction is imposed in the interests of the Irish Public Departments who consider it necessary that the printer should be close at hand. The two remaining contracts may be executed in any part of Ireland. I understand that the same necessity is felt in London and Edinburgh, and that it is met in the same way, namely, by confining the execution of certain contracts to those cities.

Rathmoyle Letter Delivery.

MR. MEAGHER: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he will reconsider his decision of not granting to Messrs. James Hogan and Patrick Kennedy, of Gaultown, Rathmoyle, Kilkenny, a daily delivery of their letters from Tullaroan; is he aware that Mr. Hogan, who is a horse and cattle doctor, and known as Mr. Hogan of Tullaroan, suffers, as well as the farmers of the surrounding districts, inconvenience by reason of their letters going to the office of that place and being redirected; and, seeing that the Tullaroan postman in the discharge of his duties passes the doors of Messrs. Hogan and Kennedy every day, thereby rendering it of no cost or inconvenience, will he recommend that this grievance be removed.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I have again considered the matter but I regret that, for the reasons which I recently explained to the hon. Member, I am unable to comply with his request. The Rathmoyle office is only one mile from the houses in question whereas the Tullaroan office is three miles.

MR. MEAGHER: Does the Post Office study the convenience of a single individual rather than that of the people of the district?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: This matter has been considered from the point of view of the general convenience.

Kilmacanogue and Robinstown Postal System.

MR. SHEEHY (Meath, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the post leaves Kilmessan at 5.25 p.m. for Robinstown to connect with the post car from Trim, which arrives at Robinstown at 9.45 p.m.; will he explain why almost five hours are taken to cover the distance from Kilmessan, which is only three and a half miles; will he consider the advisability of arranging for the post to leave Kilmessan at 7.30 p.m. to meet the mail car three and a half miles away at 9.45 p.m.; and, seeing that the bag containing the morning mails from Dublin reaches Kilmessan at 10.20 a.m. and is sent back empty by the 4.20 train, will he arrange for letters in reply to English letters brought down at 10.20 to be sent back in the bag that is now sent empty at 4.20.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The postman from Robinstown who serves Kilmessan is already absent from home for more than thirteen hours, and I do not think it right to extend the period of absence by making the hour of the evening collection later. The existing service is carried on at a loss to the revenue, and I regret I should not be justified in incurring additional expenditure on a day mail service.

MR. SHEEHY: What would be the amount of the increased expenditure involved?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON asked for notice of that Question.

The Archbishop of York.

MR. MCARTHUR (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, when he recommended the Crown to prefer the Suffragan Bishop of Stepney to the Archbishopric of York, he was cognisant of the views which had been expressed by that prelate, in his evidence before the Royal Commission on Ecclesiastical Discipline, with respect to the toleration of illegal and unauthorised ritual in the Church; and whether he was satisfied that the said Bishop, in his new office, would respect the law as declared by the Courts which have jurisdiction in matters ecclesiastical.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Before the Prime Minister answers the Question, may I ask whether in future in making recommendations to the Crown for high ecclesiastical preferment he would see that the gentleman he intends to recommend has a certificate of proficiency in faith and morals under the hand and seal of the hon. Gentleman?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): The answer to both branches of the Question is in the affirmative.

Poor Law Relief Disqualification.

MR. ROGERS: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that the work of pension committees is being delayed by the want of an authoritative interpretation of the clause relating to the Poor Law disqualification in so far as it applies to married couples in receipt of outdoor relief; and whether, as the Commissioners of Inland Revenue and the Local Government Board are seemingly not agreed as to the precise effect on the status of the wife of the legal rule, which enjoins that all relief, for whomsoever granted, shall be considered as relief given to the husband, he will state which party is disqualified in the three following cases: where the husband receives relief for his own benefit, where the husband receives relief for the benefit of his wife, and where the husband receives relief for the benefit of himself and wife.

MR. ASQUITH: I am advised that in the first case the husband alone would be disqualified; in the last two cases both the husband and the wife would be disqualified.

Clergy in Parliament

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in the scheme of electoral reform which he has promised to submit to Parliament, he will include a revision of the statutes which forbid ministers of the Established Church to sit in the House of Commons.

MR. ASQUITH: I am afraid that I am not in a position at present to make any statement as to the provisions of the Bill in question.

Coal Mines (Eight Hours) Bill.

MR. GLOVER (St. Helens): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he can state the date when the Report stage of the Coal Mines (Eight Hours) (No. 2) Bill will be taken.

MR. ASQUITH: Owing to my having given two more days to the Committee stage of the Education Bill, I regret that I am unable to find a day next week for the Report stage of the Eight Hours Bill, but I am hoping to take it on Monday and Tuesday week.

ADMISSION TO THE GALLERIES.

SIR G. McCRAE (Edinburgh, E.): I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether you have arrived at any decision in regard to the admission of strangers to the galleries of this House, and whether in your opinion any restrictions or regulations are necessary to safeguard the proper conduct of the business of the House?

MR. SPEAKER: The House seems to regard with satisfaction the absence of strangers of both sexes; but I think it is obvious that the period of rest cannot continue for ever. It has occurred to me that probably the best way of solving the difficulty, if difficulty there be, is that the House should consent to the appointment of a small Committee for the purpose of considering under what new arrangements and conditions, if any, the galleries might be thrown open to the public at the commencement of next session.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY: Cannot the restrictions as to the admission of strangers be relaxed so as to allow Members to introduce experts for advice—as has been done in the case of Ministers.

MR. SPEAKER: Experts named by the leaders of the respective parties have been admitted.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has any statement to make in regard to the course of business in the immediate future?

MR. ASQUITH: First of all, with regard to the business of to-day, I have a very important statement to make to the House, which is that the Government do not intend to proceed to-day with the Committee stage of the Education Bill. I need not give any special reasons for that, except to say that as we are now approaching, or should approach in accordance with the allocation of time, under the Closure Order, the consideration of Clause 3, which is the clause dealing with contracting-out, we feel that in the existing conditions, and until some settlement has been, as I hope it may be, arrived at, it might be a waste of Parliamentary time, and perhaps I may add that it might lead to the interposition of unnecessary difficulties in the way of approaching a settlement, if we were now, at this moment, to take up the discussion of that particular part of the Bill. I shall therefore propose, when the Order comes on, to postpone it until to-morrow. To-day we shall take the Poisons and Pharmacy Bill—which is the sixth of the Orders of the day—the White Phosphorous Matches Prohibition Bill, and other Bills which stand later on the Paper. To-morrow and Saturday we shall go on with the consideration of the Education Bill in Committee and also on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday. On Thursday I propose to move the suspension of the eleven o'clock rule for the remainder of the session and to make a statement in regard to public business. That will be followed by a Motion to allocate the time for the Report stage of the Education Bill, and after that the first Order will be the Report stage of the Port of London Bill.

MR. LONSDALE asked when it was intended to take the Second Reading stage of the Irish Land Bill.

MR. ASQUITH: I cannot at present fix a date, but I hope to be able to take it before the session ends.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY asked whether it was possible for them to go on with any other business on an allotted day for the Education Bill.

There was certain business to be disposed of, and that being withdrawn, he should like Mr. Speaker's ruling as to whether that withdrawal came under the case of disposal of the business contemplated by the last two clauses of the Guillotine Order.

*MR. SPEAKER: The business might be postponed, but that does not mean that it is disposed of. If the first Order is not proceeded with it does not count as an allotted day, and in that case the House can go through the Orders of the day.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY: Is this not an allotted day since the Education Bill is put down as the first Order?

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood) asked whether, by the terms of the Closure Resolution, an allotted day was not defined to be a day upon which this Bill was put down as the first Order.

*MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member will look at the Closure Resolution he will see that it says: "Nothing in this Order shall prevent any business which under this Order is to be concluded on allotted days, being proceeded with on any other days."

MR. VIVIAN (Birkenhead): May I ask whether, in allotting time for future business, the right hon. Gentleman, the Prime Minister will bear in mind the almost universal desire of this House to see the Housing Bill passed this session?

MR. ASQUITH: I will bear that in mind.

SIR GEORGE DOUGHTY (Great Grimsby) asked if it was not highly probable that the Education Bill would be dropped.

POISONS AND PHARMACY BILL [H.L.]
Order for Second Reading read.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL, Yorkshire, Cleveland), in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said that the Bill which the House had expected to take that day was one of the chief measures of the session, while this Bill was of purely departmental importance. If this subject came before the House for the first time or if it raised any question of controversy, then some inconvenience might be caused by this sudden change of scene, but in view of the history and nature of the Bill, he trusted that the House would not be unwilling to consider its proposals. The Bill had three purposes. Clause 1 brought up to date the Schedule of poisons which was attached to the Pharmacy Act of 1868, in the light of the knowledge of medical and pharmaceutical science which had been acquired in the last forty years. Clause 2 would, he thought, be warmly welcomed by agricultural Members, many of whom he saw in their places. It dealt with the supply of sheep dips, and weed killers, and preparations for the destruction of insects, which contained poisonous materials and which at the present time technically were under the provisions of the ordinary law. Much inconvenience was caused by the restriction on the sale of these commodities to persons who were chemists, and agriculturists had long desired that some other facilities should be given for obtaining these articles. In fact the present law could not be enforced, and these articles were largely sold by persons who were not qualified under the Pharmacy Act. Clause 2 provided that where the existing facilities were insufficient—it was not intended to compete with the chemists where they were available to sell these articles—the local authorities might licence traders, other than registered chemists, to sell these articles subject to regulations which were to be made as provided in the Bill. This proposal followed the recommendation of a very strong Departmental Committee which sat on the subject in 1901, and which was appointed by the late Government, and which recommended the change of the law embodied in the Bill. With regard to these provisions, there was little difficulty, and he imagined that there could be no objection. There were also a few other minor matters embodied in the later clauses. But the third main provision of the Bill raised a point which had, in the past, given rise to some considerable controversy. It was found to be necessary that companies which conducted the business of drug stores should be made liable for offences against the Pharmacy Act committed by their agents. That was a proper change of the law which drug stores themselves conceded to be necessary. It arose out of a legal decision that where in a shop belonging to a drug store company that unqualified person was alone to be punished and the company could not be punished, because it was not a "person" within the meaning of the Pharmacy Act. When, however, it was proposed to amend the law and make the drug store companies liable in such cases, a keen controversy at once arose between the chemists and the drug stores, not on that particular point, but on another one, namely, whether or not drug stores should be allowed to use the title of chemists. On the one hand, the qualified chemist said that he had to undergo a prolonged training, that he had to pay for an expensive education, and that he ought to have a monopoly of this business of dispensing medicine. On the other hand, his friends of the drug stores pointed out that they for many years past had been carrying on their business without interference by the law, that they supplied a popular need, and that to deprive them of the title they had long been accustomed to use, would practically destroy their business. On this point a keen controversy arose. There was a babel of tongues. The letter-boxes of Members of Parliament were filled with controversial pamphlets, and the advertisement columns of the newspapers were resplendent with manifestoes on the subject. When he first took up this subject, as representing in this House the Privy Council Office, in whose sphere the matter rested, he was told by both parties that there was only one point on which they were in agreement, and that was that any agreement between them was impossible. However, fortunately, now the case wore a different aspect. The Bill was introduced this year in the House of Lords in a non-controversial form, leaving open this vexed question in dispute between these two important trading interests. The Bill was referred to a Joint Committee of the two Houses, who heard evidence from both sides, and who were thoroughly representative. This Committee reported the Bill to the House of Lords very closely in the form in which it now stood. Since that time there had been prolonged negotiations with the organised chemists, with the representatives of the drug stores, and with the representatives of the co-operative societies, and to-day he was happy to be in a position to state that all three parties were reconciled with one another, that they all accepted the Bill in the form in which it was now before the House, subject to some amendments of detail of a very technical character, which it would be his duty to move in Committee. Under these circumstances, as this long controversy was now at an end, he trusted the House would consider this a favourable moment to assent to the Second Reading of the Bill. He begged to move.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) said he had listened with interest to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, because he remembered the controversies to which he alluded which took place at the time of the last election. He recollected that he had a very long interview with chemists in his then constituency, and he came to the conclusion that while something could be said on their side of the question there was a good deal to be said on the other. There did not appear to him to be the slightest hope of any agreement being arrived at between the two contending parties, but now he understood that an agreement had been come to. He had, however, had two communications from different people interested in the Bill, and he would like to ask the Under-Secretary a few questions in regard to them. The first communication he had was from the Grocers' Association in London. They objected to certain provisions of the Bill, and regretted that grocers should be allowed to sell poisonous substances, provided they were wrapped in a label which bore the name of a certified chemist, and they asked him to move an Amendment to this effect when the Bill got into Committee. This was an extremely technical Bill, and he replied that he did not think that anyone who was not an expert in the question should move an Amendment dealing with such an important subject as the sale of poisons. He did not know whether the Grocers' Association was in the right or in the wrong, but what he wanted to ask the Under-Secretary was whether, in view of the fact that the sale of poisons was a very important matter to safeguard, there was any foundation for the complaint of the Grocers' Association, whether he had looked into the matter and whether any alteration should be made in the Bill. Then he had an appeal from the chemists in his constituency, in which they said that at last this matter had been agreed to, subject to an Amendment to be introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Under-Secretary. He thought, before they passed the Second Reading of the Bill, they ought to have some indication of what the Amendment was, because it seemed to him that the Bill at the moment was not an agreed one, but that it rather resembled the Education Bill, which was brought in as an agreed measure, but when they got into Committee they found that it was the reverse. This, therefore, was not an agreed Bill; that was to say, the chemists did not agree except on the understanding that the right hon. Gentleman would introduce an Amendment which would suit their aims and objects. He did not wish to say a word about the Amendment, he did not know what it was, but they ought to know. It must not be forgotten that no doubt there was considerable grievance on the part of the chemists, and while he quite agreed that a company could not be prosecuted for committing any offence committed by its servants, that commonly the servants would be prosecuted, and that that wanted altering, it seemed to him that nothing should be done which would prevent large chemist companies continuing a business which they had carried on for a considerable time. They had been a very great boon to the poorer classes on account of the high prices charged by chemists, whereas they could now go to places like Boot's Stores and get drugs at prices much more reasonable. While they ought to safeguard the rights of the chemists, they ought not to give them a monopoly which would allow them to charge excessive prices. He did not wish to offer any opposition to the Bill, and he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had been able to secure an agreement on the question. He hoped the Home Secretary, who had not spoken, would inform them what was the Amendment which it was proposed to move, so that before they went to a Second Reading they might have some knowledge of what they were assenting to.

MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walton) said he only desired to add an observation to what had been said by his hon. friend, and the Under-Secretary would acknowledge that he was intervening in the debate with no desire to consume the time of the House, because a year ago he waited upon the right hon. Gentleman, as a member of a deputation which called attention to the undoubted grievance which was then felt by chemists. He only rose to ask how far the chemists the hon. Gentleman had mentioned could be relied on. He had heard some of the chemists in his constituency expressing a little doubt as to the Amendment, it was contemplated to introduce in the Bill. He could not pretend that he was in entire agreement with what had fallen from his hon. friend as to the quarrel between the chemists and the corporate body, but he would venture to say, in qualification of what had fallen from his hon. friend, that chemists who had undergone a highly specialised education in order to fit themselves for their occupation felt it a very great grievance that they were not to enjoy the same status as medical and legal practitioners. The Government should indicate in a general way what the nature of the Amendment which it was proposed to put into the Bill would be, so that the House in giving it a Second Reading, should not be in the dark, but able to feel, having the advantage of the assurance of the Under-Secretary, that they were not failing in carrying out the pledges they had given to their constituents.

MR. WINFREY (Norfolk, S.W.) desired to say, as the Member placed in charge of the Bill of the Pharmaceutical Society, that after the negotiations which had taken place with regard to the Government Bill the clause dealing with chemists was now considered quite satisfactory to the Pharmaceutical Society. The clause which it was proposed to introduce had been placed before the largest meeting of the Society that had ever taken place, and they expressed themselves as being quite satisfied.

Sir F. Banbury.

MR. F. E. SMITH asked if the Amendment might be read.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the point was an extremely technical one, and not easy to follow. The effect of the clause as it would appear when amended was that a drug store must have a duly qualified chemist in charge of the actual dispensing of the medicines containing the scheduled poisons. That was the present law, and would be continued, but in addition to that a drug store company must also have a superintendent to manage the poisons department of the company. This superintendent must be a director of the company if the company wished to use the title of chemist and druggist. If the company had got only one shop, the superintendent and the dispenser would be one and the same person, but if the drug company had a number of shops, it must have a duly qualified chemist as dispenser in each shop to dispense such medicines, and must also have a general manager of the poisons department, who was a qualified chemist. The drug companies and chemists agreed to that as a reasonable solution of the whole question. The title pharmacist was limited to chemists and druggists individually registered, but the drug stores which conformed to all the conditions could still retain the title chemist and druggist.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk) asked for a little more information on one or two points. Clause 2 had not been explained very adequately. The point he was anxious to safeguard was that no undue difficulty should be put in the way of agriculturists and horticulturists obtaining weed-killers and sheep dips, or whatever might be required for their purposes. It was also essential that no onerous conditions should be put upon those who sold these things. At present, these articles could be sold by anybody without a licence. The clause in question went further than was necessary in restricting the sale of these articles. Vendors had to get a licence from the local authority, and to conform to any regulations which the local authority made. The Bill said the local authority in granting a licence should have regard to the reasonable requirements of the public. He did not think that was quite a fair way of putting it. The local authority might say: "One very good sheep dip is being sold by so-and-so, therefore we will not give a licence to somebody else to sell another dip" which, in the opinion of some qualified to judge, might be just as advantageous. He did not think it should be in the power of a local authority to withhold a licence for such a reason as that. He thought a licence ought to be given whenever it was applied for. With regard to Clause 3 it was very satisfactory to hear that the quarrels between the retail chemists and the drug stores had been compromised. The compromise seemed very fair all round. With regard to Clause 5, the Home Secretary would remember that he addressed a Question to him recently with reference to the sale of vitriol, and the right hon. Gentleman assured him that the control of the sale of vitriol was a point that was going to be carefully safeguarded in this Bill. Subsection (2) undoubtedly dealt with the sale of vitriol, but at the same time he did not think that labelling it poison and taking the name of the purchaser would be sufficient to make the procuring of vitriol more difficult than it was at present. It would be of considerable advantage if the hon. Member would inform them what the regulations were likely to be under the proposed Order in Council. Outrages of vitriol throwing had been far too common of late, and he was sure that the House would be willing to adopt any method which was considered advisable to make the purchase of this substance as difficult as possible. If the answer of the hon. Member were satisfactory on this point, he would not oppose the Second Reading of the Bill.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs) said this Bill had come on so suddenly that he had not had time to look up his papers dealing with two different interests the representatives of which had asked him to watch the Bill and see that certain guarantees, if possible, were given before it was passed. He was not opposing the Second Reading. Among the interests which were being touched by the Bill were those of the sellers of weed killers and sheep dips. These preparations were chiefly sold by ironmongers, and in his own district there was some feeling between the chemists and ironmongers in regard to this matter. In boroughs of the class which he represented, there was a large rural area together with an urban area, and there was an intimate connection between the surrounding country and the town. There was keen competition between the ironmongers and the chemists, and he should like to know from the Under-Secretary whether, under the Bill, the sale of weed killers and sheep dips by ironmongers would be stopped. He was inclined to think that that would be a rather harsh measure which would be resented by agriculturists near country towns. He practically agreed with his noble friend opposite on this matter, and he would be greatly obliged if the Under-Secretary would deal with the question he had put.

MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury) said it was very important that agriculturists throughout the country should not be put to any kind of inconvenience in regard to obtaining weed killers, sheep dip, and similar preparations which they required. What would be the difference between the law as it now existed and as it would be made by Clause 2 in regard to the ordinary agriculturist? He was not a chemical expert, but he ventured to suggest that there were certain sheep dips and weed killers which contained substances other than "arsenic, tobacco, or the alkaloids of tobacco," mentioned in the clause, though he saw in the same clause that—

"His Majesty may by Order in Council amend this provision by adding thereto or removing therefrom any poisonous substance."

That seemed to him to be an unnecessary and possibly harsh restriction. Take his own experience. He had used a substance, which was composed of some poison or other, he did not know what it was, to rub on the backs of his cattle. This had the effect of preventing the water-fly settling upon them, thus giving the animals relief and preventing them from galloping about the field to escape the insect. It would be an unnecessarily harsh restriction if a farmer could not purchase the substance except at the place of a registered chemist. As he read Clause 2 he would not be able to purchase it elsewhere unless an Order in Council was obtained. That Order in Council, he presumed, would go to the county council, from the county council to the district council, and from the district council to the person who desired to sell the particular preparation. That was a very lengthy process, and it was hardly necessary to place a restriction of that kind in the Bill. He should like the Under-Secretary to tell them what would be the actual effect of this clause upon the agriculturists of the country, whether it would make any serious difference in their opportunities to purchase these necessary articles containing poisonous substances which every farmer had to use at some period of the year, and whether he could not see his way to removing or altering subsection (1) of Clause 2, by making it a little more feasible for agriculturists to obtain these preparations. Another point which he desired to raise was with reference to subsection (3) of Clause 3. He understood that chemists' companies were to be registered as chemists and druggists, and not as pharmacists, and that this had been agreed upon by all parties concerned, and therefore no objection was made to that provision.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL was understood to indicate assent.

MR. SCOTT (Ashton-under-Lyne) said they were told that this was an agreed Bill, but there was a clause in it the inclusion of which in the agreement he could not understand. He referred to subsection (4) of Clause 3, which insisted that before a business carried on by a company could be described as a chemists' business, there must be one director of the concern who was a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist. Take the position of Whiteley's Stores, or the Army and Navy Stores, or any other of those great organised businesses, each with a chemist and druggist department. How was one man, who had received a University education perhaps, and had become a qualified chemist, to take part in the administration of those huge businesses? He thought such a provision ought not to be forced on any concern. By all means let them provide further protection for the public, but in the carrying out of an organised business it was no part of the duty of the House to inflict such a condition upon these great business undertakings. They had some knowledge of the attitude sometimes taken by the Pharmaceutical Society, who caused to be inflicted on those who sold anything which came under Pharmaceutical Acts a fine of £5 or £10. There was no appeal against that. A person was at once brought up to the County Court. He had even known cases in which a fine had been inflicted though the article sold was not poisonous. Articles which usually contained poisons, in order that they might be sold by co-operative societies and stores had the poisons removed from them, but many people who carried on stores and had sold these preparations with the poisons removed had been unjustly fined because there could be no appeal, and the fines were collected by the County Court. He himself had considerable doubt about giving these societies increased powers. Let them give the public authorities or the public inspectors all the assistance they could, but they ought not to give over to committees of chemists or any other body the power to inflict penalties and administer the law of the country.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley) thought the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down were just. He understood that subsection (4) of Clause 3 was being modified, but he gathered that the change did not apply to the point raised by the hon. Member below the gangway. To require that a qualified chemist should be placed on the board of the Army and Navy Harrod's, Parker's, Boot's or other companies' stores was to put upon them a very onerous obligation indeed.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: They are all agreed.

LORD BALCARRES asked whether the Army and Navy Stores had agreed to have a qualified chemist on their board because they had a chemist's department? They have what compromises were in vague conversations and how different they were when they came to be reduced to the precise language of the draftsman in a Bill. The chemist's department in these big businesses represented an infinitesimal fraction of those businesses, and it was very unfair to ask those big companies to bring on to their boards men who very likely would be perfectly useless on general commercial questions in order to qualify for the term "chemists," which he should say those companies were as much entitled to use as any great firm. That was a point which required consideration. The Under-Secretary had revolutionised Clause 3 by Amendments proposed to subsection (4), but until those Amendments were on the Paper they could not know what their purport would be. There were two points to which he wished to advert. One was the effect of this proposal on the ordinary business man who sold these substances in the country districts; and, secondly, as to the extended powers which the Home Office was going to take upon its shoulders under the Bill. Everyone knew that in agricultural districts these poisons were now sold by the local "vet.," and the veterinary surgeon, though not always qualified to take that title, knew what these articles were. He knew what the ordinary proportions were and he dealt in articles which were as a rule made up for him by some respectable chemist in a neighbouring town, and he almost defied the Home Office to say that the scandals which had been caused in the last few years by the illicit use of poison could in the smallest percentage of cases be traced to these country veterinary officers. It was not with them that the scandal began nor upon them that these severe measures should fall. The scandals began in the bogus urban chemist's shop. That was where poisons were improperly bought, and it was against them only that it was really necessary to invoke all these immense powers. As the Bill was drafted, the ordinary veterinary surgeon, who for years past had been in the habit of supplying sheep dip to farmers, would have to obtain a licence. He did not see why the local authority should be allowed to prevent this man from selling these poisons unless it could be shown, and it had not been shown, that it had been the cause of scandal in the past. His real objection to the way the Bill was drafted was that a general scheme was laid down by Parliament, and that actually within the four corners of the Bill the Government took to itself the right to abrogate all or any portions of the Bill. By subsection (3) of Clause 1 the Home Office was entitled to lay down the most minute conditions governing the trade of men who dealt in those poisonous substances.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: The Privy Council.

LORD BALCARRES: But that is under the Home Office.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: Not at all.

LORD BALCARRES said then it ought to be.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: The Home Office has never dealt with the question of poisons or medical questions. They have always been the business of the Privy Council.

LORD BALCARRES said they had not the experts. The Home Office was the Department dealing with explosives. There were two items in Schedule 1 which were material ingredients of the most dangerous explosives in the world. He was not going to attack the Home Office. He was going to criticise the growing tendency of this Government to take the right in its Bills to abrogate what Parliament had settled. He thought the Home Office could make regulations of a far-reaching character. Apparently he was wrong, and it was not the Home Office but the Privy Council, but it made very little difference. Let the House consider the six sub-heads on which regulations were to be made: first as to the granting of licences and the selection of authorities which had that duty; then the duration, renewal, revocation, suspension, extension and reduction of such licences. That seemed to ensure that a poor man who had got his licence was to have no peace. It said that all kinds of regulations might be made about keeping, inspecting and copying the register of licences, and the keeping, transporting, and selling of poisonous substances. That really was giving a Government Department too much latitude. He was not opposed to making proper regulations for dealing with these poisonous substances, but he thought a Government Department at Whitehall, in drawing up its regulations, was often apt to overlook the difficulties. A man living in the country might safely keep his poisonous substances in a manner which would be intolerable in London. He knew cases where local authorities had themselves kept substances of a highly dangerous character in a box by the side of the road for years, and no objection had ever been taken. It was known it was there, but it was not dangerous because it was in an out-of-the-way part of the country, and the material was concealed in a wood. Now they made a precise declaration which would apply to London just as much as to the wild lands of some country parish, and the regulations were bound to be harassing. The only safeguard that the public had was that the Order in Council was to be placed before Parliament, but what was the good of that? There was no protection in it. It was a purely nominal affair. Questions might be asked on it, but that was no check upon the Privy Council, which had not a representative in the House of Commons. But the Department also put restrictions in Clause 5 on the sale of certain mineral acids, which they said must have the word "poison" on the outside of the bottle, and the name of the person who sold it. That was a perfectly futile regulation. Everyone who had been interested in the cases which had recently occurred, and which had been wholly urban, knew that where a man had been charged with having failed to mark "poison" outside, the label had got wet and had come off. They should deal with these matters in a much more specific manner, and insist that the bottle itself should be marked and not a label stuck on which might come off in a moment. They had power to make new regulations. Clause 2 took special power at any time to revise or withdraw the regulations which had been made, and there was a penalty of £5. He had received a good deal of correspondence with regard to the Bill, and a good many of his correspondents were unaware that an agreement had been arrived at. They viewed the Bill, if not with hostility, certainly with some suspicion. If Clause 3 had been agreed to so much the better. It put a long and tiresome controversy out of the way. But he was quite sure the Under-Secretary ought to give adequate time before any further stage of the Bill was taken.

*MR. IDRIS (Flint Boroughs) said very little was obtained by the chemists on the joint committee, but having regard to the urgent need for legislation a compromise had since been arrived at with everybody concerned as far as he could judge. The Joint Stock Companies Association and the Co-operative Stores agreed to, and such companies as John Barker and Company strongly supported these restrictions. The regulations which might be made as to the substances which might be put in and taken out of the Schedule by the Government Department were objectionable to him, as also were a good many of the powers given under the Schedule, but to some extent he found in other countries, such as France and Germany, Government Departments undertook this duty and the work was done remarkably well. He had had as an interested party several times jointly with others to make representations to the Privy Council, and he had come to the conclusion that business was done there remarkably well, and the publication of these proposed regulations would certainly enable those who objected to them to make representations to the Government Department, and in all probability they could obtain modifications if necessary in the public interest. The noble Lord had spoken of the licences applying in all towns, even in London. There were not many sheep in London. He believed they were intended to apply only to agricultural districts where it was said farmers found it difficult to obtain these poisons. The inspection of the books of licence-holders was an absolute necessity for the public safety in order to trace cases of criminal poisoning. In nearly all cases of poisoning by arsenic the poisoning went on until several members of a family had been killed before it was suspected. It was not until there had been a large number of deaths that the suspicion of neighbours was aroused and inquiries were made. In the country it was quite a common superstition among horse-keepers that arsenic gave horses a glossy coat. The present state of the law was simply chaos with regard to the sale of poisons. There was no sufficient check on anything, and the restrictions in this Bill were very much in the public interest. Some people were not satisfied with the measure—in fact, many chemists were far from satisfied with it. The only thing in the Bill in favour of chemists was that in future they would be able to call themselves pharmacists. Many of the details would be best threshed out in Committee. He could assure the House from a close study of this question that the Bill contained nothing prejudicial to the public interest, whilst on the other hand it was very necessary for the protection of the public. He hoped the Bill would receive a sympathetic reception. One hon. Member thought there ought to be a more stringent restriction on the sale of vitriol, but having regard to the many interests concerned he thought they had chosen the best compromise. They had given the makers of agricultural poisons and the purchasers of them every possible facility and they had protected the title of “chemist” to some extent.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye) asked the Government to make it quite clear that it was not intended by Clause 2 to make it more difficult but easier to obtain poisons necessary in agricultural pursuits, and he appealed to the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Office to see that the Orders in Council were issued with the utmost despatch. It was, for instance, very important that fruit-growers should be able to get the materials for their spraying. Probably a great deal of the mixture used would be used this winter for winter spraying, and it was of the utmost importance that they should be able to obtain it before it was too late. He hoped also the Government would see their way to extend somewhat the exceptions to the Act, because there were a variety of substances which, although not of general use, were very valuable in certain isolated cases. There were one or two diseases with which fruit-growers had to contend in which it was almost necessary to use cyanide of different kinds. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would bear that in mind and consider whether it was not also possible to extend the list to certain well-recognised animal medicines, which one found or ought to find in every well-conducted stable. He did not think it ought to be necessary to go to a chemist to obtain those things. It was sometimes difficult to obtain what one wanted, and it was inconvenient always to have to go to a registered chemist. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would make this point quite clear, because the agriculturists of the country were very eager to have Clause 2 placed upon the Statute-book this year, and that he would see that no undue delay occurred before the Orders in Council were issued and the advantages of the clause obtained.

MR. ANNAN BRYCE (Inverness-Burghs) suggested that in the exceptional circumstances the Under-Secretary to the Home Department should either put the terms of the new clause on the Order Paper or furnish them to the Press, so that everybody interested would see exactly how the matter stood. He thought the House would agree that some regulations in the way of licensing were necessary. In many parts of the country some of these poisons were kept by grocers and general storekeepers, and if the person who had charge of them was careless there was a danger of the bag containing the ingredients of sheep-dip, for example, bursting and the contents getting mixed with other goods sold in the shop. It was certainly necessary that the local authority, which was acquainted with the character of the persons who retailed those poisons, should be consulted as to whether they were suitable persons to hold a licence. The Bill was an immense improvement and produced some order out of chaos. He was glad the right hon. Gentleman had been able to announce an agreement on this long-argued question.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) said there were two reasons why he supported this Bill. In the first place it was a Bill that had come from another place, where he was sure it had received full and ample discussion and consideration; and in the second place no guillotine Motion had been put upon it. He also supported the Bill because he understood it was a compromise arrived at between the chemists and the drug store companies. Like other hon. Members, he had had during the last two years innumerable communications, not only from his own constituents, but from all parts of the country, urging him, on behalf of the chemists, to resist the Bill before the House; and he had also had representations from the companies, pointing out that their demands were just and asserting that the chemists were most unreasonable people. It was very difficult to know what was right and proper in these matters, but as they had been assured by the Under-Secretary and hon. Members opposite who spoke for the Pharmaceutical Society that the Bill was satisfactory, as non-experts they did not need to indulge in much criticism on the Second Reading. He did not think it was quite reasonable of the hon. Member for Ashton to state that he strongly objected because one director of these trading companies had to be a qualified chemist. This Bill was a compromise, and therefore, neither side could hope to get all they wanted. They had an instance of the difficulty of arranging a compromise in the case of the Education Bill, which was now in a very parlous condition. If the representatives of companies in the House were going to oppose the Second Reading or criticise it because they could not get everything they wanted, and refused to budge to meet the chemists, then he thought they must rather despair of getting any legislation on the subject. From what he had heard he thought this was a fair compromise, and therefore, he should support the Second Reading. As regarded Clause 2, subsection (1), which laid down that those who were to be allowed to sell certain poisons were to have a licence from the local authority, he most strongly supported that proposal. The people who sold those poisons ought to be under some supervision, and he could imagine no better body than the local authority to have the supervision of these people. He presumed that in towns the authority would be the borough council, and in the counties the county council. One hon. Member had urged that the list of poisons sold by these people ought to be extended, but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be very careful in extending the list of poisons which might be sold by these more or less irresponsible people, because, although they were licensed, they were not like properly qualified chemists. He did not think that dangerous poisons should be put into the hands of inexperienced people in view of the risks which the last speaker had pointed out might arise if these people were allowed to continue as in the past to store and sell these things. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman in his reply would state why Ireland was to be treated differently from England and Wales in this matter. If he could explain subsection (a) of Section 6 he would be obliged, because a more outrageous instance of legislation by reference he had never read. The subsection was as follows:—

“For the reference to the Pharmacy Act, 1868, there shall be substituted a reference to the Pharmacy Act (Ireland), 1875, and the Pharmacy Act (Ireland), 1875, Amendment Act, 1890, and the reference to regulations made under Section 1 of the first-mentioned Act shall not apply.”

Was it reasonable at five minutes notice to ask the House to criticise such a subsection as that? There was only one other point which he wished to raise. It was a point which, though it might be impossible to deal with it under this Bill, it would be advisable to include if time could be found to do so. He meant that some means should be found to deal with the extensive use of morphia and other drugs which had unhappily become very prevalent in this country, not only among men but also among women. He noticed that Section 5 of the Bill said—

“It shall not be lawful to sell any substance to which this section applies by retail, unless the box, bottle, vessel, wrapper, or cover in which the substance is contained is distinctly labelled with the name of the substance and the word ‘Poison,’ and with the name and address of the seller of the substance, and unless such other regulations as may be prescribed under this section by Order in Council are complied with"

Subsection (2) of the same clause said—

"The substances to which this section applies are sulphuric acid, nitric acid, hydrochloric acid, soluble salts of oxalic acid, and such other substances as may for the time being be prescribed by Order in Council under this section."

Though perhaps when this Bill was originally introduced the question which he raised now was not in the minds of the promoters, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he could see his way to include in the list of substances, with respect to which regulations might be made from time to time by Order in Council, morphia and other things which were used in the drug habit. They had been trying to legislate about drinking, and they had not agreed as to the means to be taken to decrease it, but really the drug habit in this country was insidiously, and without the whole nation knowing, doing nearly as much harm as drinking. If the right hon. Gentleman could see his way, either in this Bill or in some other way, to introduce such measures as would diminish the facilities for obtaining these drugs from chemists and other people, he would do more than could be done by any Licensing Bill to promote morality and upright conduct in this country.

MR. VIVIAN (Birkenhead) said the co-operative societies had for the last two or three years resisted the passing of this Bill, but what was called the compromise had given them all the satisfaction they required. There were just two points he wished to deal with. First of all the Bill did not prevent co-operative bodies from carrying on the business of chemists and druggists. The first portion of subsection (4) of Clause 3 gave ample power to carry on business. There was no restriction of any kind in that direction. The other point had reference to the question of title. There had been some difference of opinion on that point between the promoters of the Bill and the co-operative organisations. The chemists protested against the use of the personal title of chemists or pharmacists by corporate bodies, but they were willing that these bodies should use any title which would place before the public full information of the fact that they were carrying on this business. They might therefore adopt such names as "Drug store," "Drug selling department," "Pharmaceutical department," "Department of chemistry," "Dispensing department," "Sale of medicines and drugs departments," or even "Pharmacy and drugs department." The co-operative bodies said that that was sufficient to meet their views, and they had no desire to trench on the personal title, so long as they were able to carry on this particular business. The second portion of the subsection left them free to carry on business under such titles as he had mentioned. There remained, therefore, no substantial difference between the co-operative bodies and the chemists. Personally, he objected to all kinds of restrictions. He sympathised with the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London on that point. In what he had said he had expressed the views of 1,500 co-operative organisations. He believed he had also expressed the views of the Army and Navy Stores, and similar institutions. The powers contained in the clause would amply serve their purpose.

MR. FORSTER (Kent, Sevenoaks) in supporting the Second Reading of the Bill said he especially favoured the measure because it dealt with the subject raised by his hon. friend the Member for Blackpool. It was most desirable that steps should be taken to remedy the evil which had come to be known as "the drug habit." He thought it would be some consolation to his hon. friend to know that this Bill did something to stiffen up the law with regard to the sale of morphia and other preparations.

MR. ASHLEY: Where is the provision?

MR. FORSTER said it was provided for in this way. Clause 1 said—

"Schedule A. to the Pharmacy Act, 1868 (which specifies the articles to be deemed poisons within the meaning of that Act), is hereby repealed, and the schedule to this Act shall be substituted therefor."

The schedule of the Act of 1868 did not contain any reference to opium or any of the preparations derived from opium. The schedule of this Bill included "Opium, and all preparations or admixtures containing 1 or more per cent. of morphine." Section 17 of the Act of 1868 stated the conditions under which it was unlawful to sell poisons, and by applying that Act, as amended by the Bill now before the House, to opium they were really making a very drastic alteration of the law which he most heartily welcomed. There was not the slightest doubt that the drug habit was largely on the increase. It was one of the most insidious and deplorable diseases to which man or woman could succumb, and anyone who knew of its ravages could not feel other than grateful to those who were making it possible to do something to deal with the question. He knew something of the evil of the drug habit. He happened to be a member of a voluntary committee which was formed to inquire into the genuineness of one of the cures for inebriety which had been established in the Metropolis. Their proceedings were full of interest. The committee had before them cases in which, so far as they were able to tell, an absolute cure had been effected. The stories of misery which were told by the people who had been cured almost brought tears to the eye, even of a hardened politician like himself. He, for one, would feel real gratitude for any opportunity of doing something to make more difficult the acquisition by those unhappy people of the drugs which they abused. That reason would make the Bill acceptable to him if there was no other. He supported the suggestion that vitriol should be included in the schedule. He would be very glad to see the conditions of the sale of these drugs stiffened.

*MR. HEDGES (Kent, Tonbridge) wished to call attention to the latter part of subsection (4) of Clause 3, which he did not think was necessary. Chemists jealously guarded the use of the title "chemist," and it appeared from the speech of the hon. Member for Birkenhead that corporations and large companies who had been taking that title were no longer desirous of using it. Under the latter part of Clause 3, the monopoly of the use of the title "chemist" had been taken away, and the title of "pharmacist" was given instead. It was not altogether fair to men who had served a long apprenticeship and who had after study passed difficult examinations, to deprive them of this title of "chemist" and give them that of "pharmacist," a term which would be obscure to the man in the street.

SIR HENRY CRAIK (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities) said that the Bill had come on so suddenly that he had been unable to ascertain what was the full opinion of his constituents on the subject matter of the Bill, although he had had a great deal of correspondence about it. There were many more points of interest in the Bill than those to which the Under-Secretary had referred. He was not particularly interested in Clause 3, which seemed to him to deal with some compromise as to trade regulations between chemists and druggists. He was afraid that compromises were not much in favour just now; and they were apt to be made between two branches of a trade, as in this instance, without any real consideration for the interests of the public. The fact that a compromise had been made between the two branches of this particular trade—the chemists and the druggists—did not recommend the Bill to him. The really important part of the Bill was Clause 2. As he understood it, the clause did away with the restrictions that now existed with regard to the sale by tradesmen of sheep dips and other poisonous substances used for agricultural and horticultural purposes. Was there any other country in the world, except our own, which imposed so few restrictions on the sale of poisons of the sort referred to in the Bill? Why should the general health of the community be disregarded, and proper scientific precautions not be taken, and this widespread sale of poisonous substances be allowed, because it was a little more convenient to the farmer to get them from the nearest grocer's shop? It seemed to him that they were now proposing to give a very dangerous relaxation of the law with regard to the sale of poisons, such as would not be permitted in any other country, certainly not in France or Germany whose examples were so often quoted. A large class of people were required to qualify themselves by a long course of study and by obtaining University degrees after strict examination, before they could enter upon a certain business, in which they were entitled to certain privileges. Was it fair to those people to sweep away the whole system under which they had obtained those privileges simply because agricultural constituents of certain hon. Gentlemen would find it a little more convenient to have free trade in poisons carried on by ignorant persons? After all, would other professional people, like his friends who were members of the Bar, and their medical brethren who had passed severe examinations and qualified themselves for those professions, like the restrictions on the practice of their professions swept away, and be told that their work could be done equally well by unqualified men? Were these dangerous poisons to be spread over the country under the guise that they were useful for agricultural or horticultural purposes? He felt very strongly that the restrictions instead of being relaxed should be carefully guarded so as to prevent the ordinary uneducated man selling dangerous poisons, even on the ground that it would be a benefit to a particular industry such as agriculture. Clause 4 interfered with the existing provisions relating to the Pharmaceutical Society; it considerably modified its power of granting their certificates; and it would be convenient to know what other changes were proposed. The scientific qualifications and tests of professional skill were to be taken away, and instead, licences were to be granted by local authorities. Was it reasonable that the House should leave it to an Order in Council to say what was a local authority in which this very important power of granting a licence was to be vested? Parliament itself should lay down what was the local authority whose licence was to be in substitution for a scientific education. While he would not oppose the Second Reading of the Bill, he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would give the House time enough to consider these matters before they took the Bill in Committee.

*MR. B. S. STRAUS (Tower Hamlets, Mile End) thought there were certain provisions in the Bill which ought to be amended before it became an Act. Although the drug habit was increasing in this and all other countries, this Bill would not do much to interfere with it. It simply made it illegal that certain things should be sold except by a qualified chemist, but the whole mischief was the ease with which the latter could sell articles which were injurious to health. He was not sure that there was not greater harm in the drug habit than in the drink habit, but both were so harmful that it lay upon Members to do everything they could to restrict the sale of them. There was an article sold to-day called "chlorodyne" which was labelled "poison." When he was chairman of the largest asylum in London a poor creature was brought there who had taken large quantities of this mixture, very much to her detriment. He asked her how she got the stuff, and she said that it was true it was labelled "poison," but she could go to a chemist and although he would only sell her a bottle she could go on to other chemists and get more. Although the dose was only about twenty drops she had taken two or three teaspoonfuls many times a day, and of course it had the effect, which most of these drugs had, of turning her brain. He was hoping that the Government would introduce into a Bill of this kind provision making it more difficult for the general public to get drugs of a dangerous character. What often happened was that a patient got a doctor's prescription for morphia or some other drug of that character, and although it might be years old it was hawked about from chemist to chemist, and what was an excellent thing for the complaint the patient was suffering from at the time, proved most dangerous when it was taken permanently. Although the prescription was two or three years old the chemist would supply a bottle of it, and often the person producing the prescription said he was going to the South of France, or for a sea voyage, and he should like half-a-dozen bottles, and very often he got it. He knew of a person who had a prescription for chloral in rather heavy doses, and he had a great deal of trouble in getting a large quantity of it at a time, but the stores supplied half-a-dozen bottles on the plea that he was going yachting to Norway and Sweden. The person who obtained that quantity, he need not inform the House, was not any better for it when he came back. He was hoping that it would be quite possible for the Government to insert some clause to make it absolutely necessary that a doctor, in giving a prescription of a dangerous character containing a poison, should affix a date, and make it illegal for a chemist to dispense that dangerous drug after a month had elapsed. This was not merely his own opinion, but from repeated conversations with eminent medical men he knew that would be popular with the healing profession. The danger was now being rather accentuated by the putting up of most dangerous drugs in compressed or tabloid form, and people were using them because they could get them so easily. He had said before, and he repeated that he believed the love of drugs was as bad as that of drink and if they could get an opportunity restricting this traffic it was their duty to do it, and he believed that no measure would be more useful to the community than one which would make it more difficult to get the drugs which were so popular among the drug-taking fraternity. He entirely agreed with the last speaker as regarded the naming of the authority which should have this important duty put upon it under the Bill. He thought it should not be left to an Order in Council, but ought to be decided by the Government. He congratulated the parties to this dispute on coming to a fair compromise, but he hoped, before the Bill became an Act, some clause would be inserted which would make it more difficult for the drug-taking population to secure drugs, so that they should not get them with the same amount of ease with which they could get them now. Although it might not be known, he was sure that a very large portion of the misery and disease which certain classes of our population were suffering from to-day was owing to their having taken, at some time in their lives, drugs which did not show the bad effects at once; and in regard to the well-being of our people no measure would be of greater or wider use for the benefit of all than a measure which would restrict the facilities for getting these dangerous compounds. He did not think it was necessary for him to say anything more, except again to ask the Government to insert the local authority that should have cast upon it the important duty of giving a certificate to the person who might dispense these articles, and not leave it simply to the machinery of an Order in Council, under which different authorities might be named. He also hoped the Government would see their way to put something in the Bill to restrict the sale of those articles which were sapping away the lives and happiness of our people.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said it was quite correct that Clause 2 of the Bill made the sale of poisonous substances more free, but those who objected ignored apparently the exact state of the facts. All over large tracts of country the law, as it was at present, was set at defiance, and had been for years. He did not so much mean set at defiance as broken by general consent, owing to the enormous necessity for the supply of these drugs. What was the position? Hon. Members who lived in the country knew perfectly well that there were large districts in Ireland where the town was so small that a properly qualified druggist and chemist could not exist. Were they going to say to the poorer farmers in such districts that they should not be allowed to get sheep-dip and preparations of that kind? A substance which had not been mentioned, but which he thought ought to be mentioned, was sulphate of copper. There were hundreds of tons needed where no chemist was likely to have it. Sulphate of copper was required for spraying potatoes, and it was sold in every store in every country town. The result had been that in large districts of the country the Act of 1868 had been for many years a dead letter, and these necessary poisons were sold for the convenience of everybody. It was recognised by everyone that convenience must override the law. He was stating what was an absolute fact; and, therefore, he thought the Government were perfectly right in bringing the law into harmony with the facts of the case. He thought the Government, so far from curtailing the rights given under Section 2, ought to extend them to all these substances which were commonly used by the country people for the destruction of fungi, or for sheep-dips, or spraying potatoes or fruit trees. He thought all these ought to be included under Section 2, and it ought not to be left to the Lord-Lieutenant in Council to investigate this question. What was the use of leaving the Lord-Lieutenant to inquire whether sulphate of copper was useful when everybody knew it was? Clause 2 was an absolute necessity for the convenience of the rural districts, and in those districts cases of poisoning were exceedingly rare. Whenever there was a case it was generally rat-poison that was used, and seldom anything else. Clause 2 did not apply to rat-poison or anything containing strychnine. He thought the clause was necessary, and hoped the Government would stick to it.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.) said that owing to this Bill being brought on them at short notice, it was very difficult for some of them who were interested in the subject, and who represented another part of Ireland than that represented by the hon. Member who had just sat down, to deal with the matter. At the same time, they were entrusted with the task of trying to elicit from the Minister in charge of the Bill what compromise had been concluded with regard to the chemists and druggists in Ireland. He understood from the new clause read out that it only referred to chemists and druggists in England and Scotland, but anyone who turned to the end of the Bill would see that a certain portion of the measure applied to Ireland, and he understood that great dissatisfaction had been evinced among certain sections of the chemists in that country with regard to Clauses 2 and 3. The Under-Secretary, in reading out the new clause, made no mention whatever of how it would be affected by Clause 7, which said that the provisions of this Act, relative to the regulation and sale of certain poisonous substances for agricultural and horticultural purposes, and to restrictions on the sale of certain mineral acids, should apply to Ireland with certain modifications. Clause 2 dealt chiefly with the poisons which were used in the production of agricultural articles—sheep dip, and so on, and it would be found there that so much of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, as made it an offence for any person to sell or keep open a shop for the sale of poisons, unless he was a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist, and conformed to the regulations under Section 1 of that Act, should not apply to poisonous substances containing certain materials, such as arsenic, tobacco or alkaloids of tobacco, to be used exclusively in agriculture or horticulture. Clause 2 was rather obscure, in so far that the Act to which it referred, the Act of 1868, had twenty-eight clauses, and in considering Clause 2 of this Bill it was necessary to go through the whole of the Act of 1868 to see what portion of it referred to the sale of these poisons. That, taken by itself, was a matter of considerable labour, but, in the circumstances under which this Bill was introduced, it was an absolute impossibility. He would like to ask, was Ireland included in the compromise referred to?

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the later clause affecting the position of chemist and druggist companies did not affect Ireland.

CAPTAIN CRAIG replied that if that were so, a large section of the chemists of Ireland thoroughly objected to the Bill. He had understood that some arrangement had been come to by which Clause 3 would be extended to Ireland. If that was so, it would be acceptable to the chemists. The only part of the Bill which referred to Ireland was Clause 2 and a part of Clause 6 referring solely to the sale of articles connected with agriculture and horticulture. If only Clause 2 was applicable to Ireland, he would like to ask whether there was anything in the Bill to allow the right of sale to be extended to those who were connected solely with horticulture and agriculture in Ireland. There was a grievance touching these great seedsmen and rose-growers and fruit-growers, having the right to sell the various articles enumerated in Clause 2, which affect their particular branch of horticulture. They had an expert knowledge in the cure of the various diseases from which fruit trees and other things suffered. In the readjustment of the Bill, before it came to the Committee stage, he hoped the Government would make some arrangement whereby these large and established firms would be able to sell these articles, which they were able from their expert knowledge to certify were the best remedies for the diseases to which he had referred. He would like to know also whether it was not the fact that certain restrictions were to be put on those who had sold these potato sprays and sheep dips in Ireland, because in some of the out-of-the-way districts in Ireland some restriction ought to be put in force. The danger was in those districts, not where these things were sold in packets, but where they were supplied in smaller quantities, where packets were broken up, perhaps by a small child of the shopkeeper, in which case some of this poisonous material might be left on the counter in close proximity to food and other articles of consumption. He had been told that the restriction to be placed on the sale of these articles would take the line that they would not be allowed to be sold in any shop where food or drink was sold. But whether that suggestion had been accepted by the Government he had not been informed. The hon. Member for East Mayo had spoken quite truly when he had stated that in certain out-of-the-way parts of Ireland there was not a certified chemist within reasonable distance. But even where there was, the prices charged by the registered chemist for these articles were much higher than those charged by the druggist. Co-operative societies also had sprung up and grown rapidly in Ireland during the past few years, and they claimed a right to be allowed to sell these articles, done up in tins, bottles or parcels, in their particular localities. Although the Bill, so far as Clause 2 was concerned, was of as much interest to Ireland as to any other part of the United Kingdom, not one word, in the course of two hours discussion, had been said by Ministers as to how it affected Ireland. He really thought that the Vice-President of the Captain Craig.

Department of Agriculture for Ireland, who, he understood, had charge of that part of the Bill, should have been in his place and given the House some enlightenment on that matter. He did not oppose the Bill, and should not divide against the Second Reading, but unless some explanation was given he hoped some of his friends would oppose it and insist on the Vice-President being sent for immediately.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that most of the points which had been raised were such as could only be settled in Committee, and it was obviously impossible for him to discuss them that day. With regard to the general principle of Clause 2, it was one of the most important clauses in the Bill. The purpose of that clause was not to impose restrictions on the sale of weed-killers and sheep-dips to farmers, but, as he said in moving the Second Reading, to enable agriculturists and horticulturists to get those articles which contained poisons more freely than they were now able legally to do. Ironmongers and others who now sold those commodities did so illegally, and were liable to prosecution at any time. Although in recent years few prosecutions had taken place, yet between 1896 and 1901 there were 749 prosecutions by the Pharmaceutical Society, mainly, he believed, in cases of this character. In some parts of England the sale of these articles was restricted absolutely to chemists through those prosecutions. Under the Bill, other persons who were to sell these commodities were to be licensed and were to conform to the requirements of the Act.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY asked if the restriction would apply to the sale of patent medicines which were specially excluded from the Act of 1868.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said they did not come within the purview of the clause. Clause 2 dealt only with those commodities which were used for agriculture, and which contained particular poisons as ingredients, such as arsenic, tobacco, and alkaloids of tobacco. The precarious position of the present sellers of these poisonous materials for agricultural purposes must be dealt with. On the one hand, it was obvious that they ought to extend the existing legal facilities. He thought that all Members of the House must agree to that. Even the Member for the Scottish Universities, when he came to consider the matter more closely, especially if he read the Report of the Departmental Committee of 1901, could not fail to come to that conclusion. On the other hand, it would be very inadvisable to throw open the sale of poisonous materials, some of them very poisonous, to all and sundry without any restriction at all. Therefore they proposed to require a double check. One was that the local authority should license the trader who was to sell these materials, so that only persons of repute who could be properly trusted to take precautions should get these licences; and, secondly, these poisonous materials were only to be sold in accordance with the regulations which were to be made by Order in Council for the safeguard of their storage and use.

AN HON. MEMBER: What local authority?

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the local authority was to be determined by Order in Council, but it would be carefully considered whether it would be possible to insert a precise designation of the local authority in the Bill. He would consult with his right hon. friend the Lord President of the Council on this matter. This was not a Home Office Bill; it was a Privy Council Bill, and he was speaking not as Under-Secretary for the Home Office, but as representative in that House of that Department. The hon. Member for Mayo had said that this Clause 2 ought to be enlarged, and that the poisons which were specified there should be added to, and he had mentioned one or two materials which were sold for use in agriculture. By an Order in Council other materials, which at any time might be brought into use for those purposes, could be added to those specified in Clause 2 of the Bill. He hoped that he had made it quite clear that it was not intended to restrict farmers in obtaining these articles, but to enable them to do so more easily, and this had been warmly welcomed by chambers of agriculture throughout the country. The hon. Member for Blackpool brought up the question of morphia. This Bill did make a change in the law; it took morphia out of Part II. of the Schedule of the Pharmacy Act of 1868, and put it into Part I., and thereby further restrained its sale. It might be said that the whole of the Pharmacy Acts ought to be amended so as greatly to increase the restrictions on substances such as these. That was a question which ought to be dealt with, if at all, after inquiry and with the aid of expert knowledge, but all the restrictions provided by the existing law which applied to the most deadly poisons, like prussic acid for example, would now be applied to the sale of morphia. The hon. Member had asked him how far the Bill applied to Ireland, and whether the compromise arrived at with regard to Clause 3 would extend to that country. Ireland had its own code of Pharmacy Acts, and the Pharmacy Acts which they were amending did not apply to Ireland at all. They had their own Orders in Council made by the Irish Privy Council. His right hon. friend did not originally propose to apply the Bill to Ireland; but there was a great desire on the part of Irish agriculturists that Clause 2 should be extended to their country, and it was in accordance with that desire that that extension was made. Clause 5, which dealt with comparatively small points, also applied to Ireland. Clause 3 which dealt with the vexed question of companies which were chemists and druggists, did not apply to Ireland, and communications consequently had not passed between the Government and the chemists and druggists and the companies of Ireland as in England. It would be difficult, he did not say impossible, to adapt the Irish Pharmacy Acts to the purposes of the Bill. It would mean legislation by reference of a complicated kind. But if it was desired that Clause 3 should apply to Ireland, he would be happy to take representations on the point into consideration. There had been communications with the Irish Government, but he was not convinced that there was the same agreement in Ireland as in England with regard to Clause 3. He need hardly say, however, that if there was a general desire among Irish representatives that the clause should be extended to Ireland, with the necessary modifications, of course, the Government would be very glad indeed to do all in its power to meet their wishes. The Government's own desire was to arrive at a general agreement of this character. The adaptation to this particular Bill of the Irish Pharmacy Acts would be a matter of much complexity, and hon. Members must not complain if the clause consisted of legislation by reference of a somewhat complicated character; that would be inevitable. The noble Lord the Member for Chorley had asked how far there was a real compromise in England, and had suggested that the compromise was on the basis of vague conversations which might break down. When the Government had drafted the clause it was submitted to the various parties. He held in his hand three letters with reference to this matter. He submitted the clause as proposed by the Government to the organised representatives of the various parties, and he had a communication from the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain saying that they would agree to the clause as it would stand when the suggested Amendments were inserted; and he had a letter from the Companies Chemists Association, which included the Army and Navy Stores, the Junior Army and Navy, Harrod's, Spiers and Pond's, Boots' Cash Chemists, and all the other protagonists in this fight, and also a letter from the Co-operative Union, which represented the co-operative societies of England and Wales. The whole of these bodies unanimously accepted without any reservation whatever the clause as it would be when amended by the Government proposals. The hon. Member for Inverness had suggested that the House should have an opportunity to consider the precise terms of the compromise. He would hand in Amendments to-night in order that they might appear on the Order Paper to-morrow, and in ample time for the Committee stage. He thought that this Bill, which was of a technical and detailed character, would properly be dealt with by a Standing Committee rather than by the Committee of the Whole House. He had no doubt that the Standing Committee would consider it in a spirit of goodwill and with a desire to pass the Bill. It was a measure which raised no element of party controversy. He thought that all sections of the House desired to see an end put to this long standing dispute, and he trusted that, as the Bill had already passed the House of Lords, before very many days had elapsed it would have passed through the House of Commons.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.) said he agreed that it was most undesirable that these preparations sold for the purposes of agriculture should continue to be sold by persons in defiance of the law. But there was another class they must think of at the same time, namely, those people who had the right to sell these sheep dips and potato spraying mixtures to agriculturists, and who had actually been disposing of them in various districts for many years. It would be a very serious thing, when this Bill passed, if anybody might be allowed to sell these commodities in their immediate neighbourhood. It would be an interference with what had been an undoubted monopoly of qualified persons—a monopoly which they had enjoyed for many years, and out of which no doubt, they had made a very good income. There was no doubt that such persons ought to be considered. He was not content to leave entirely to the local authority, especially as they had not been informed what that local authority was, the absolute right to say whether or not any person should be allowed to sell these things. He was sorry to say that no matter what the measure was, if it applied to Ireland, politics and religion were sure to enter into its administration. And he could quite realise the case in which a local authority, say a rural district council, if it were fixed upon as the authority who was to have the administration of this Act, might decide that a certain individual should have the right to sell these materials, and so perhaps pay off an old score against the person who up to then had been the only one who had had the right to sell these commodities.

Mr. Herbert Samuel.

There should be some stringent provisions for regulating that part of the measure. He thought also that where an individual was refused a licence he ought to have the right of appeal to some tribunal which he might consider more impartial than the local authority. He objected very strongly to the extensive powers which were left in the hands of the Privy Council. There was the further objection that the regulations which they framed were to be laid on the Table of the House, so that there might be an opportunity of considering them. So far as that safeguard was concerned, it might as well be left out of the Bill altogether. As had been pointed out by hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House, everything that was done under the Bill was handed over en bloc to the Privy Council. They had become accustomed to this kind of legislation; none the less he thought that it was extremely harmful and retrograde. There were many things in these subsections which he was firmly convinced ought to be kept in the hands of the House. For instance, the regulations as regarded the granting of licences: he thought that the House, and not the Privy Council, ought to lay down the various classes of persons to whom these licences should be given. He certainly thought the House should fix definitely what the local authority was to be, which should have the carrying out of the Act. He desired that the Bill should pass into law, because in theory, at any rate, there was nothing contentious about it, but he would ask the right hon. Gentleman again to consider before the Committee stage whether he could not, with the assistance of the draughtsman who had so skilfully drafted that gem of draughtsmanship, sub-clause (a) of Clause 6, a gem in the way of legislation by reference, include the compromise which had been arrived at on Clause 3. This was a very excellent opportunity of trying to clear up the differences and difficulties which had existed quite as much in Ireland as in this country. It was hardly reasonable to complain of the non-attendance of any Minister to answer for the Irish part of the Bill, but at any rate they had a grievance, inasmuch as they had no one on the Treasury bench who could give them any information whatever with reference to what it was intended to do on the various points which applied to Ireland alone. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give them ample time, before the Bill went into Committee, to communicate with interested parties and formulate Amendments, and that there would be full discussion in Committee and on Report.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time and committed to a Standing Committee.

WHITE PHOSPHORUS MATCHES PROHIBITION BILL.

As amended (in the Standing Committee) considered.

EARL OF RONALDSHAY (Middlesex, Hornsey) moved to omit Clause 1, for the purpose of obtaining a little more information with regard to the necessity of the Bill. He had already been informed in answer to a Question that there were ten factories in this country at which white phosphorus was used in the manufacture of matches, and that there were only five cases of necrosis during the past five years, all of which occurred in one particular factory. As nine out of ten factories using white phosphorus had, therefore, been absolutely free from cases of necrosis for five years the occurrence of the disease entirely in one factory must have been due to negligence either on the part of those concerned in the factory or on the part of the inspectors, whose duty it was to see that safeguards were put in force. One of the main objects, he gathered from the Memorandum accompanying the Bill, was to enable this country to join the Berne Convention. He believed there was no material benefit to be gained by going into the Convention, and supposed that the object was really a sentimental one. But had it occurred to the Home Secretary that those who were urging the passing of the Bill had not altogether foreseen what the result would be if it became law? The object of the Bill was to prevent recurrence of cases of necrosis, a disease which was preventable already. A result which would probably follow from the Bill would be the creation of a large trust among match manufacturers, because the Bill would prohibit the importation of all matches in the manufacture of which white phosphorus was used. It also appeared from the Memorandum that these manufacturers had agreed to the Bill. It must have occurred to the Government that these manufacturers would reap an advantage by increasing the price to the consumer. Were there any reasons for other countries not having joined the Berne Convention—Russia and Austria, for instance?

*MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord is not entitled to discuss the whole Bill on the first clause. He must confine himself to the first clause. He is now making a Second Reading speech.

EARL OF RONALDSHAY said his vote on whether to leave the clause out or not was dependent on the reasons which were given for retaining it. He was only anxious to know what the real necessity was for our joining the Berne Convention. If he could get the information he had asked for he would be very glad to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. HICKS BEACH, in seconding, asked what were the reasons explained in Memorandum Cd. 3271 of 1906 why the Government at that time were not able to agree to the Berne Convention. He had done his best to find a copy of that interesting document, but there appeared to be only one in existence, and that was in the possession of the late Home Secretary. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would tell them what had actually transpired since 1906 which had enabled the Government now to enter the Convention, and to bring in a Bill of this kind. He thought his noble friend had brought forward one or two strong points against the necessity of bringing in the Bill.

—(Earl of Ronaldshay.)

Question proposed, “That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill.”

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.) said the chief reason for the Bill was the desire absolutely to eliminate the danger from necrosis. It was true that few cases had occurred during the last few years, but he thought that immunity had been secured only by great trouble and continual watchfulness, and they could not say that they were safe from an outbreak. The question could not be dealt with by legislation just after the Berne Convention. At that time they hoped to be able to proceed entirely by fresh regulations and those regulations were taken in hand; but difficulties were encountered, and it was evident that fresh rules could not be imposed without serious cost to the trade. When that became evident the regulations dropped, because they saw it would be a simpler matter to deal with the question by Bill. A second material point was that there were certain patent rights in existence, and they could not prohibit importation, and thereby give undue advantage to two or three manufacturers at the expense of the rest. The result of their communications with the manufacturers on this point was entirely satisfactory. Those who were interested in existing patents undertook to give to the other manufacturers the use of those patents at a nominal figure which was merely a recognition of the patent rights, and in regard to any future manufacture that might come into existence, they undertook to give the patent rights at nearly a nominal price. That disarmed suspicion by itself. The Board of Trade had ample power of control under the Bill to secure to any manufacturer free and proper use at a reasonable price of those patent rights. In the circumstances there was no possible danger arising from the formation of combinations of manufacturers. So far as the general necessity for the Bill was concerned, it was desirable, though he admitted there had been few cases lately of necrosis poisoning, if they could do it, absolutely to eliminate the chance of this very dreadful and painful disease occurring. It was so dreadful that, even if only one case had occurred in the last few years, this Bill, which would involve no trouble or expense, would be justified. The Bill was supported in every part of the House, and he hoped it would be allowed to pass.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS (Kent, St. Augustine's) said that after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman he would not detain the House many minutes. He did not think it was unreasonable that his noble friend should have asked the right hon. Gentleman to make the reply he had done. The Opposition raised no objection to the Second Reading, thinking it was universally accepted, and they were anxious to get forward with the measure. On that occasion, they obtained an understanding that the right hon. Gentleman would not think them unreasonable if they asked two or three questions when the Bill came forward in the House. He understood that the Home Office thought prohibition was absolutely necessary to stop this painful disease of necrosis or phossy jaw. The late Lord Ritchie, after an exhaustive inquiry, imposed upon manufactories where white phosphorus was used, stringent conditions as to ventilation, cleanliness and periodical inspection, and, besides that, he caused the dangerous processes to be separated. When he himself was at the Home Office those regulations had had the effect of almost suppressing the disease in this country, and there were only five cases in the year 1904, and three of those were very mild, whilst the other two were caused entirely because the operatives would not obey the regulations laid down. In 1906 there were no such cases at all, and he did not understand that there had been any recurrence of the disease. There was some little criticism in the year 1905 when there was a Convention sitting at Berne. At that time, as the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean knew, there was a Foreign Office objection to proceeding with this measure, and he wished to know whether Japan agreed to the present Convention. With regard to the second Convention, upon which the present Under-Secretary was the representative of this country, he gathered that the representatives were unanimous in the decision they had come to. He would like to ask the Under-Secretary what action was taken by Japan and the United States, and whether the latter intended to carry out prohibition in that country. That would have a considerable effect upon the manufacturers of this country, and he believed that was the reason why the right hon. Gentleman had thought it better that there should be a total prohibition of the landing of matches made with this substance from other countries. He did not know that this House would disagree with a policy of that kind, and they might wish to see it carried much further. All he wanted to know was what were the terms under which ordinary British manufacturers not in the "circle" could obtain patent rights. He shared his noble friend's alarm that some trust might be formed, which might be a disadvantage to the best interest of their manufacturers at home. It would be open to them at a later stage, if they were not satisfied, to ask further questions as to the terms made with other Powers.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland) said he was somewhat surprised at any opposition to a Bill of this kind, and more especially at the Motion made by the noble Lord.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said he had already pointed out that the Opposition allowed this Bill to pass the Second Reading unopposed on the understanding that they would be afforded opportunities for discussion at a later stage. He denied that the Opposition were opposing the Bill.

MR. SUMMERBELL said under those circumstances he would withdraw what he had said upon that point. Even if there had been only one case they ought to make an effort to prevent this terrible disease recurring. A most extraordinary statement had been made by the noble Lord, in which he said a Bill of this character would prevent the importation of matches, and that prohibition would give a monopoly to British manufacturers which would inevitably result in an increase in the cost of matches to the consumer at home. That was an extraordinary statement, and he only wished to emphasise it in view of future discussions.

EARL OF RONALDSHAY asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

EARL OF RONALDSHAY moved an Amendment to Clause 2 (Prohibition of Sale) providing that the prohibition of the sale of white phosphorus matches by any retail dealer should not come into operation until 1st January, 1912, instead of 1911. The object of the Amendment, he said, was to enable retail dealers who had large stocks of these matches to have a little time to dispose of them. He thought this was an Amendment which the Government would consider was reasonable, because if it were accepted it would not in any way interfere with the efficiency of the Bill. It might put off for one year the time when they would attach their signatures to the Berne Convention but that ought not to trouble them very much. He would like to give a reason why he thought the time allowed for retailers getting rid of their stocks of matches was not sufficient. They liked to have wrappers on the boxes upon which their own name was printed, and any other advertisement of their own; and they could only secure those particular wrappers by giving very large orders. He believed that the ordinary order necessary to secure such wrappers was something like ten gross of boxes. To a man not doing a very large business it was impossible for him to dispose of that property in two years. He believed that the Under-Secretary was of opinion that, generally speaking, two years would be sufficient for retailers to dispose of their stock, but his information was of a contrary nature, and the right hon. Gentleman would find that many retailers in his own constituency would be ready to support what he had said. He did not know this Bill was coming on so early, or he could have given many proofs that these retailers would not be able to get rid of their stocks within the time allowed. He had received a telegram from a grocer at Peterborough stating that he had a stock of these matches which he could not dispose of at the present rate of business under less than three years. [Cries of "Oh, oh."] Hon. Members below the gangway apparently were not conversant with the grocery trade.

MR. SEDDON (Lancashire, Newton) said he was conversant with the grocery trade, and had spent twenty years in it.

EARL OF RONALDSHAY said that in the case of this particular grocer three years would be required before he was able to dispose of the stock he had in hand. There would be no risk in accepting this Amendment, and it would not impair the efficiency of the Bill, therefore he could not see what possible objection there could be to it. The importation of these matches was to be prohibited, and also their manufacture. Consequently, the sale of them would cease by the natural course of events. There was another hardship which would be inflicted upon the retail traders. Under the Explosives Act railways were not allowed to charge less than 5s. or 6s. upon any consignments of matches. In order to be able to defray the expense of carriage under these conditions it was necessary they should order matches in large quantities, otherwise they would not make any profit on them. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would accept this Amendment, otherwise he would feel bound to press the matter to a division. He begged to move.

MR. HICKS BEACH, in seconding the Amendment, said the case put by his hon. friend was worthy of consideration. There were people who would suffer hardship if the proposal in the Bill were carried in its present form. What possible harm could it do to extend the period? The whole object of the Bill was to prevent disease arising from the use of white phosphorus, and it appeared to him that the extension of the period for one year could do no possible harm. That would enable retailers to get rid of the stocks which they had laid in. He would support the Amendment unless the Home Secretary could give some valid reason for not extending the period.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 5, to leave out the word 'eleven,' and to insert the word 'twelve.'"—
(Earl of Ronaldshay.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'eleven' stand part of the Bill."

*MR. GLADSTONE said that in consequence of representations made by the trade an extension of time to 1911 was given in Committee, and now the Government were quite satisfied that the trade as a whole were entirely satisfied with the Bill as it stood.

EARL OF RONALDSHAY : Will the right hon. Gentleman say what is the objection to extending the time ?

*MR. GLADSTONE : The objection is that it is really not necessary.

MR. HICKS BEACH : Would it have any detrimental effect with respect to this country becoming a signatory to the Berne Convention ?

MR. RUPERT GUINNESS (Shoreditch, Haggerston) pressed for an extension of the time on behalf of small grocers. He had received some representations on their behalf, and he thought the proposal in the Bill would operate unfairly in regard to them.

*MR. GLADSTONE asked whether the representations had been received since the Committee stage of the Bill.

MR. RUPERT GUINNESS said he had received them within the last few days. The people for whom he pleaded had to buy their matches in large quantities, and it took a considerable time to get rid of the stocks.

LORD BALCARRES expressed the hope that his hon. friend would not press the Amendment. He did not believe that grocers were going to suffer to any great extent. It was only in exceptional cases that phosphorus matches were stored in grocers' shops. In trying to protect the small grocer, they might inflict this potential danger on everybody else in the trade. At present the whole of the match trade was in exceptional difficulty, having severe regulations hanging over its head. The extension of the time would inflict great expense and consequent hardship on the trade, and, therefore, he hoped that the operation of the Bill would not be postponed.

Amendment negatived.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill be now read a third time,"—(Mr. Gladstone)—put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILL. [H.L.]

Order for the Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir W. ROBSON, South Shields) moved the Second Reading of this Bill, which, he said, had come down from the Lords. The object of the measure, he explained, was to enable the Privy Council and the Court of Appeal to receive the assistance of Judges who were available for the purpose without any creation of new Judges. The first clause would enable a Colonial Judge to act as assessor of the Judicial Committee on the hearing of appeals from a Colony. This applied only to cases where the services of such Judges happened to be available, and enabled the Privy Council to avail themselves of their services in proper cases. Then there were Indian Judges who were happily often in this country and retired Judges who had served in a High Court in British India, and whose assistance would be of great benefit to the Privy Council. The second section accordingly enabled His Majesty to direct that such Judges might be made members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. This applied only to those Judges who had already the distinction of being privy councillors. Another section provided that the Lord Chancellor might request any Judge of the High Court in England to sit as an additional Judge of the Court of Appeal.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir W. Robson.)

LORD BALCARRES said he understood that under this Bill it would be possible for one of the assessors to be a Judge who had already adjudicated in a case.

SIR W. ROBSON said that Clause 4 referred to the Supreme Court of Judicature Act of 1875, and that provision would prevent what the hon. Member alluded to.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House, for To-morrow.—(Sir. W. Robson.)

COMPANIES CONSOLIDATION BILL.

Order for the Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Churchill.)

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS asked whether they were to have no explanation at all. He wanted to know whether the Bill had been before a Select Committee or the Law Officers of the Crown. There were a large number of clauses in the Bill, and he would like to get an assurance on that point.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. CHURCHILL, Dundee) said the Bill was simply a consolidation Bill, reproducing the law at present expressed in eighteen different statutes. It had been considered by a Joint Committee of a most representative and authoritative character.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House for To-morrow.—(Mr. Churchill.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. J. A. PEASE, Essex, Saffron Walden), in moving the Adjournment of the House, said that in the possible event of the Education Bill not being proceeded with, which he thought improbable, the Government proposed to proceed on Friday with the Port of London Bill.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD (Somersetshire, Wellington) asked if the Government did proceed with the Education Bill would they go on straight with Clause 3!

MR. J. A. PEASE: That is certainly the intention.

Whereupon MR. SPEAKER, in pursuance of the Order of the House of 31st July, adjourned the House without Question put.

Adjourned at nineteen minutes after Seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS
CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Education Syllabuses—The Apostles' Creed.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash): To ask the President of the Board of Education if he will say what is the proportion of local education authorities that include the Apostles' Creed in their syllabus of religious instruction to be given under the Cowper-Temple Clause.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) I regret I can only refer the hon. Member to the Return of Religious Instruction in Council Schools, issued by the Board of Education in 1906 (No. 115). In a considerable number of areas the syllabus varies in individual schools, and it is not possible to give accurate particulars of the number in which the Apostles' Creed is included.

Voluntary School Grants.

MR. A. ALLEN (Christchurch): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether it is the intention of the Government in the Education Bill now before the House to repeal Section 97 of the Education Act of 1870, which enacts that the grants to provided and to voluntary schools shall be on the same scale; and, if not, whether the grants proposed to be made to schools that contract out, as set forth in the First Schedule, will be made also to council schools; and, if it is the intention of the Government that the grants as set out in the First Schedule of the Bill shall not apply to the council schools, can he state what proposals the Government proposes to make as regards the annual grants to council schools.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) This Question does not now arise.

School Teachers' Salaries—Proportion per Child.

MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether he can state what was the average sum per child spent by local education authorities on salaries in elementary provided schools, in voluntary schools, and in all elementary schools during the year ending 31st March, 1907, in London, the county boroughs, London and the county boroughs taken together, and throughout the country; and whether he can give the like information with regard to each of the other items (rates being, however, distinguished from taxes and insurance) shown on page 2 of the White Paper [Cd. 4406] of this year.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.)

Salaries of Teachers.	London.		County Boroughs.		London and County Boroughs.		England and Wales.
	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.
Staff of council schools - -	72	4	52	11	59	8	54	2
Staff of voluntary schools -	53	10	49	7	50	6	48	7
Other teachers - - -	3	1	1	4	1	9	0	11
Total - - - - -	71	1	52	11	58	3	52	7

In the figures given above the staff of higher elementary schools are included. With regard to the latter part of the hon. Member's Question, the remaining items cannot be shown separately for voluntary and council schools, and in some cases cannot be separated from each other. I am considering whether accurate figures as to any of the headings can be obtained. It is in any case impossible to distinguish rates from taxes and insurance.

Royal Naval Reserve—Case of Alfred Rutherford of Leeds.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if his attention has been called to the case of Alfred Rutherford, of Leeds, who has served twenty-three and a half years as a member of the Royal Naval Reserve, but is now in ill-health, suffering from heart affection; and, if so, can he state whether it is the intention of his Department to grant him the pension which is due to him.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) From 10th March, 1903, to 30th September, 1907, Alfred Rutherford was in receipt of a pension of £12 a year, which was granted on the ground that he was wholly incapacitated from contributing to his own support. When surveyed in July, 1907, with a view to the renewal of the pension, he was reported to be materially able so to contribute, and it was stated that he had obtained employment as a verger. No further award of pension could be made under the regulations governing the Royal Naval Reserve, which restrict the grant of a pension in the case of men under sixty to those who are pronounced, upon medical examination, wholly and permanently incapacitated from earning a livelihood, provided that such incapacity is not due to their own imprudence or misconduct. If he is now unable to maintain himself, he should make application to the local registrar, Royal Naval Reserve, who will cause him to be again medically surveyed with a view to the reconsideration of his case.

Collection of Tea-cess by Indian Government.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that for many years the Ceylon tea planters have been paying, at their own request, a tax collected by the Government for pushing the sale of Ceylon teas in new markets, especially in America; that at the instigation of a few people or a very small minority, that is, 4 against 70 tea planters, Lord Elgin gave notice that the cess must cease; that this decision created consternation among the people connected with the planting enterprise; whether he is aware that three years ago the Indian tea planters, realising the benefits accruing to Ceylon by this cess or self-imposed taxation, started one of a similar character, and its collection has been allowed for five years more, viz., to 1913; whether, seeing that His Excellency the Governor of Ceylon has written a despatch urging His Majesty's Government to allow the Ceylon planters to continue the payment of this taxation, in view of the benefits derived therefrom, he will say what answer has the Secretary of State given to the appeal of the Governor; and whether he has any objection to lay the correspondence upon the Table of the House.

(Answered by Colonel Seely.) Lord Elgin decided in October 1906 that the the tax, and that it was difficult to defend a law which at the wish of the majority of a class taxed a dissenting minority for purposes essentially in the nature of private enterprise. The Secretary of State sees no sufficient cause for reversing his predecessor's decision. It will, of course, be open to the majority to raise the funds which they think necessary without the intervention of the Government. I may observe that the vote of 70 against 4 to which the hon. Member refers was apparently a vote of the Ceylon Planters' Association in February last, whereas Lord Elgin's decision was taken in October, 1906, as I have already explained, and was prompted by the objections of a considerable number of persons and companies interested in the tea industry, of whom many are not resident in Ceylon, and therefore do not vote at meetings of the Planters' Association. It is not proposed to lay Papers upon the subject.

Old-Age Pensions Regulations.

MR. ASHTON (Bedfordshire, Luton): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether a man seventy years of age otherwise entitled to a pension is debarred from receiving one if his wife is in receipt of parish relief, even if she is in the workhouse or its hospital owing to mental infirmity.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) If the wife were in receipt of ordinary poor relief the husband would be disqualified for receiving a pension, but the disqualification would not apply if the relief afforded to the wife were confined to maintenance in an infirmary, or to such medical or surgical assistance as is excluded by the proviso to paragraph (a) of Section 3 of the Old-Age Pensions Act.

Charge for Annual Revision of County Westmeath.

SIR WALTER NUGENT (Westmeath, S.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of the facts that the area of County Westmeath is 442,370 acres, number of townlands 1,625, total valuation, £327,323; County Meath is 577,734 of townlands, 1,625, and n, £538,203; cost of re-county Westmeath, £170; cost of revision for County Meath, £180; he will furnish the Westmeath County Council with the information they have asked for as to how the charge for the annual revision of the said county is arrived at.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) I would refer the hon. Baronet to the Answer of my predecessor of 2nd April last. I understand that the amount of work to be done in a county during the annual revision does not depend either on the area or the number of townlands, nor yet on the total valuation.

Compulsory Attendance at Contracted-out Schools.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether the school attendance officer will have the same power to take steps to enforce the attendance at contracted-out schools, under the Elementary Education Bill (No. 2), as he now possesses in respect of provided schools in England and Wales.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) This Question does not now arise.

Sale of Impure Whiskey at Irish Fairs.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): To ask the Chief-Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in tents and booths at races and fairs, for which the Justices in Ireland grant occasional licences, a compound, largely composed of sulphuric acid, known in the West of Ireland as fair whiskey, is largely sold and is very injurious to His Majesty's subjects; and will he take steps to secure that some of the vendors are prosecuted by the police under the Food and Drugs Act or other relevant statutes.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Inspector-General of the Royal Irish Constabulary informs me that it is sometimes alleged that a compound such as is referred to is sold as whisky at fairs and races in Ireland, but, so far as he is aware, no proof of the correctness of such allegations has ever been forthcoming.

Arbitrator's Charges at Carrick-on-Suir.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-

Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the members of the Carrick-on-Suir (No. 2) District Council consider the account furnished to them by the arbitrator for expenses incurred by him in awarding compensation in the cases of acquiring sites unopposed by landlords or occupiers under the Labourers Acts as extravagant, having regard to the work to be done and the fact that the sites to be visited were in a comparatively limited area; whether the arbitrator charged for fifteen and a half days' time exclusive of sustenance allowance, travelling expenses, printing, typing, postage, etc.; and whether local authorities are compelled to pay expenses claimed by Local Government arbitrators or officials if they consider such claims excessive.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The facts are as stated in the Question. The Local Government Board inform me that the amount which the Board, after full consideration of the council's objections, certified as payable by the council, is reasonable, having regard to the work done and is not above the average for a scheme of the size in question. The amount mentioned in the certificate issued by the Board as to the costs, charges, and expenses incurred in the matter is a debt due from the local authority to the Crown in pursuance of Article 28 of the Second Schedule of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890.

Irish Local Government Board Surcharges.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state in how many cases the Local Government Board have proceeded for surcharges against presiding chairmen of local public bodies in Ireland for the years 1905-6-7; what was the amount claimed in each year named; in how many cases were proceedings prosecuted outside of the district where the alleged offence took place; has his attention been drawn to proceedings last week against Thomas Shannon, Vice-Chairman of the Bawnboy Rural District Council, in the city of Belfast; were the surcharges sued for two items of 8s. and £1 4s., being for relief granted to a woman suffering from paralysis and to a household in a poverty-stricken mountainous district where there was illness and children starving; did the auditor inquire into the circumstances and did the magistrate refuse to take evidence on this point; and whether, in view of the effect of the prevailing surcharge provisions, he will have the whole matter reviewed with a view to having this matter put right, even by legislation if necessary.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The duties of the Local Government Board in regard to surcharges are confined to deciding upon any appeals duly made to the Board against them. It is upon the auditor that the duty of recovering surcharges is imposed by statute, both in cases where no appeal is taken against the surcharge and where they have been confirmed on appeal either by the Board or by the King's Bench. The Board have no record of the number of instances in which payment of the surcharges has been refused and the auditors have been obliged to have recourse to legal proceedings for their recovery. In the majority of cases, however, in which surcharges are made upon members of local authorities the members surcharged are those who authorised the expenditure surcharged, and the presiding chairman would be included among such persons. As regards the case of Thomas Shannon, the surcharges of 8s. and £1 4s. were in respect of the cost of outdoor relief afforded to the wives of two farmers who were each in occupation of twenty acres of land. The auditor, before making these surcharges, fully inquired into the circumstances of the cases. No appeal was made against them, and he proceeded to recover the amounts. Mr. Shannon, however, went to Belfast, where service of the summonses having been effected with the auditors, the cases were eventually made an order for costs. The merits and decided the cases are put to have a and merely amounts of the auditors are put outdoor relief to occupiers of over a quarter of an acre of land. They are well aware of the existence of this prohibition, and the auditor had no option but to make the surcharge.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES (IRELAND) BILL.

Lords Amendments to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 389.]

A POINT OF ORDER.

MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central) said he desired the ruling of Mr. Speaker on a point of order. Yesterday he put down a Question to the President of the Board of Education for oral Answer. It was clear that it vitally concerned the business before the House to-day. The Question was not reached, having been put down too late. He had neither received an Answer privately nor had one been printed with the Votes. He desired to ask whether there was any redress under the circumstances.

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not know what the explanation is. The rule is, in case the Answers to the Questions have not been reached, to hand them in at the Table and they will be circulated with the Votes in the morning. For what reason the ordinary rule was not followed I do not know.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury) said if the Question had been reached and had been put orally he had intended to ask the hon. Gentleman to allow him to circulate the Answer with the Votes, as it was a very long one. He had given instructions that the Answer was to be circulated with the Papers that morning.

notice that on Monday I shall move, "That the Order for the Committee Stage of the Elementary Education (England and Wales) (No. 2) Bill be discharged and the Bill withdrawn."

PORT OF LONDON BILL.

Order for consideration, as amended, read:

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. CHURCHILL, Dundee) moved to recommit the Bill to a Committee of the Whole House, in respect of the new clause standing on the Notice Paper on 12th November last. Owing to the noise in the House the greater part of the right hon. Gentleman's observations were not heard in the Gallery. He was understood to say: When this Bill was in Committee, the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone pressed me very strongly, the hour being late, not to proceed with the new clause which stood in my name on the Paper, and urged that facilities should be granted for the discussion of the clause relating to the acquisition of land by the authority of the Port of London. The Motion which I now make is part of the bargain which was arrived at late at night, and which was that in consequence of the general assistance in the despatch of business which the Committee were good enough to give the Government, I should move to recommit the new clauses, before entering on the consideration of the Bill as amended. I beg to move.

Motion made and Question, "That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House in respect of the new clauses standing on the Notice Paper on the 12th day of November last,"—(Mr. Churchill,)—put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. EMMOTT (Oldham) in the Chair.]

MR. CHURCHILL moved a new clause giving power to the Board of Trade to authorise the construction of works, etc. He said: There are unnecessary misapprehensions in the House and outside it as to the scope and character of the new clause which I now move. In the first place, this clause in the form in which I have placed it on the Paper does not constitute the reintroduction of the clause which was mutilated by the Committee. The amended form modifies and very extensively restricts and reduces the character of the clause, which has been adopted with a view, so far as possible, to meeting the principal objections which led to its mutilation before the Committee upstairs. The clause, as originally conceived by my right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed to give the new Port authority special facilities in regard to the acquisition of land and certain other works of construction which they might be called upon to undertake. There was the clause and there was the schedule. The facilities were of two kinds. By the clause an easier, a more expeditious and more convenient procedure was substituted for the regular procedure provided by the Bill. In the schedule the conditions on which land could be acquired were assimilated to the conditions under which it may be now acquired in connection with the working of the Small Holdings Act. Now that was the clause as it was put before the Committee. As it is now the schedule is no longer in the Bill, and consequently we have not to deal with any proposal for modifying the usual practice for acquiring land under the Lands Clauses Acts. The procedure is perfectly known and will be rigidly followed in any acquisition of land under this clause. We are only concerned with the question whether we shall or shall not allow the Port authority to adopt some simpler means of procedure so far as Parliament is concerned than that which is generally followed. I do submit most earnestly to the House that there is a very strong case for not denying to the new Port Authority something like the same facilities as those accorded to and enjoyed by the great competing ports on the Continent—Antwerp, Hamburg, and other ports which are rivals to the Port of London. There are grave disadvantages about forcing an authority of this character to come to Parliament for powers in connection with every small piece of land, however insignificant, which it may wish to acquire, and to go through all the expense and all the friction involved in the controverted passage of a private Bill. The result of such a procedure would, I think, be that, instead of extending its wharfage, the Port Authority would endeavour to get along as far as it could without acquiring land. I submit that those who think that the Port Authority ought to have a fair chance consider that it is very desirable to give them a certain measure of confidence and elbow-room in respect to the acquisition of land. I feel, on the other hand, that where the transaction is on a large scale it is necessary and proper that Parliament should survey it. It has been proposed that power should be given to the Board of Trade to dispense with the need of access to Parliament where the transaction is small and uncontroversial. The anxiety which has been aroused, I think, quite unnecessarily, by the clause as it stands with the Schedule in its original form, still continues, though to a less extent, in regard to the clause as it is modified, and I have, therefore, endeavoured, so far as I can, to ascertain the views of Members on both sides of the House and of the Standing Committee. As a result of several conferences which have been held, I have been able to meet the general view of members of the Committee and of the House. Their point has been that, while it is desirable that the Port Authority shall have liberty as to the acquisition of land, they do not think the Board of Trade should be constituted the sole judge as to whether Parliamentary powers should be dispensed with. They think there is too much Board of Trade in the Bill, and that the Government are giving too great a discretionary power into the hands of a Department. I will, therefore, be prepared to move to subsection (3) an Amendment providing that, before making an order authorising the acquisition of land, the Board of Trade under this section shall appoint an impartial person to hold a public inquiry on their behalf. The effect of that would be that the Board of Trade may delegate their power to some impartial person, who would hold a public inquiry and decide whether the case is one which ought to come before Parliament or whether it is small enough to be settled by him. It would, however, still be in the power of the Board of Trade to say that the matter should come before Parliament in the ordinary course. I also propose to move an Amendment saving from the operation of the clause any existing statutory right in regard to land.

Mr. Asquith.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend)
Is the inquiry by the Board of Trade to be by only one person or are several persons to be appointed?

MR. CHURCHILL: Only one person is to be appointed. Let me assure the hon. Gentleman opposite. The idea is that very small matters may arise which would certainly not be of sufficient importance to be dealt with on the merits by the elaborate procedure of private Bills, and in that case the Board of Trade will appoint an impartial person to hold a public inquiry. I trust that the modifications and safeguards which have now been made will remove the apprehensions which have been felt and the prejudice which has existed against this clause. Let me once again remind the Committee how important these alterations are. First of all, the Schedule is gone. There is no new procedure as to the terms on which land shall be acquired; there is only a simplification of the procedure. In the second place, by Section 3 the operation is confined to small transactions. In the third place, an impartial person is to be appointed, not a departmental official, but one outside the scope and authority of the Department, and who will decide whether or not the transaction is small enough to be decided by him or whether it should come to Parliament.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) said there was no allusion in subsection (3) to small transactions.

MR. CHURCHILL: I think I am right when I say small transactions—

“If it appears to the Board of Trade that by reason of the extent or situation of any land proposed to be acquired compulsorily, or the purposes for which such land is used, or any other circumstances, the land ought not to be acquired compulsorily without the sanction of Parliament, the order of the Board shall be provisional only and shall not have effect unless confirmed by Parliament.”

I am advised that this would confine the operation of this dispensing power to small transactions, and an impartial person would be able to make sure that a free, thorough, and dispassionate interpretation is placed upon what are or are not small transactions. With those safeguards I think the House ought to entrust the Port Authority with the powers we seek to confer upon it. It would be a great hindrance if this great Port of London had to fight for its prosperity and its existence against rivals equipped with far greater powers as to the acquisition of land and the construction of works than are possessed in this country at the present time. It would be unduly hampering the new Port authority in the struggle they will have to carry on against great and powerful Continental competitors, if they were denied by the House the very carefully safeguarded liberties which I now venture respectfully to demand on their behalf. I beg to move.

New clause—

“(1) Where the Port Authority propose to construct, equip, maintain, or manage any works, and the works proposed to be constructed are such that they cannot be constructed without statutory authority, or are such that in the opinion of the Board of Trade they ought not to be constructed except under the authority of such an order as is hereinafter mentioned, or compulsory powers are required for the acquisition of land, or it is sought to impose any charges not previously authorised in respect of the use of any works when constructed, the Port Authority may apply to the Board of Trade, and thereupon the Board of Trade may make an order:—(a) Authorising the construction and equipment of such docks, quays, wharves, jetties, or piers, and buildings, railways, and other works in connection therewith as may be specified in the order; (b) authorising the purchase and taking otherwise than by agreement of such land as may be specified in the order; (c) authorising the imposition, levying, collection, and recovery of such dues, rates, tolls, and other charges in respect of the use of any works proposed to be constructed, and conferring such powers of management of those works, as may be specified in the order; (d) authorising the Port Authority to charge to capital, as part of the cost of construction of any work authorised by the order, the interest on any money raised to defray the expenses of construction of any such work and the acquisition of land for the purpose, for such period and subject to such restrictions as may be mentioned in the order. Provided that:—(a) no land shall be authorised by an order under this section to be acquired compulsorily which is situate to the westward of the meridian six minutes east of Greenwich; and (b) an order authorising the construction of new works shall impose on the Port Authority an obligation to provide such housing accommodation for the persons to be employed at the new works when constructed as the Board of Trade may from time to time consider requisite. (2) Any order made under this section authorising the purchase and taking of land otherwise than by agreement shall incorporate the Lands Clauses Acts as if the order were a special Act within the meaning of those Acts. Provided that the Board of Trade may by Provisional Order make such modifications and adaptations of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts to be incorporated in an order under this section as may be specified in the Provisional Order. (3) If it appears to the Board of Trade that by reason of the extent or situation of any land proposed to be acquired compulsorily, or the purposes for which such land is used, or any other circumstances, the land ought not to be acquired compulsorily without the sanction of Parliament, the order of the Board shall be provisional only and shall not have effect unless confirmed by Parliament.”—(Mr. Churchill.)

Brought up and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the clause be read a second time.”

LORD R. CECIL said he must tender his very sincere thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for the complete way in which he had fulfilled the pledge which he had given on the last occasion when the Bill was before the House. He had carried out his pledge not only to the letter but in the spirit, and they had a fair opportunity of considering this clause in the fullest possible way. He must confess, however, that his doubts had not been removed by what the right hon. Gentleman had said. The argument put forward for this clause was that it was required in order to enable the Port of London to compete with Continental ports. That must mean that this was to be a really considerable power to be exercised in important matters. It was to be observed that other ports such as Liverpool, for instance, had been quite successful in competing with Continental ports, and so up to now had the Port of London, without these exceptional powers. He had had an opportunity of looking at the evidence given before the Committee, but he confessed that he had not been able to refresh his memory with regard to it for the purposes of to-day, because he was not aware until early that morning that there was any prospect of this Bill coming before the House. But when he did read the evidence he did not perceive any testimony at all that this power was required in order to enable the Port of London to compete against Continental ports, nor did he remember anything of that kind. Possibly he might be mistaken about that, but he was not aware of anything. Therefore he might say that they expected some very clear evidence before the House should be asked to consent to this very large departure from their usual practice in dealing with matters of this kind. He would remind the Committee that this clause as it stood was of a far-reaching character. It proposed to give power to the Board of Trade to—“ Authorise the construction and equipment of such docks, quays, wharves, jetties, or piers, and buildings, railways, and other works in connection therewith as may be specified in the order.”

In other words, as drafted, it gave the Board of Trade power to pass any such measure as had ever been brought before Parliament dealing with the construction of docks on the Thames or elsewhere. In subsection (b) it went on—

“ Authorising the purchase and taking otherwise than by agreement of such land as may be specified in the order.”

The land was some of the most valuable in the country. Far below the line fixed by the Bill there was land of enormous industrial value, and the proposal was that it should be acquired without the consent of the parties by order of the Board of Trade. That was to be taken in connection with the enormous works clause in subsection (a), and he was not surprised, therefore, to find that the clause was opposed before the Committee, not only by the landowners, but by the Chamber of Commerce and the London County Council, and perhaps by others. Whatever reasons members of the Joint Committee might give for their decision now, they could only speak for themselves—they could not speak for the Committee as a whole, which had rejected the proposal, and he thought the House ought to be exceedingly careful before they reversed, even at the request of the Government, the decision of a strong Joint Committee of that kind on a question which was essentially a matter for evidence and argument. But, apart from that, he had the strongest possible objection to this departure from ordinary procedure. The substance of the proposal was that with reference to this particular undertaking a special law was to be made which did not apply to any other similar undertaking in the country, and the nature of that special legislation was to be to oust the jurisdiction of Parliament to a perfectly indefinite extent. The right hon. Gentleman said it was only intended to be used for small transactions, but really the security that the House had that it would be only so used was of the flimsiest possible description. There was nothing whatever in subsection (3) which limited it to small transactions. All it said was that the Board of Trade after an inquiry before an impartial person, who might, for aught he knew, be one of the officers of the Board of Trade, might authorise anything which was within the terms of this clause. He did not understand why the right hon. Gentleman said that was necessarily to be confined to small transactions. If he had put into the clause a statement that no transaction involving a capital expenditure of more than £1,000, or something of that kind, should be sanctioned under the order of the Board of Trade, there would be a real security; though he should still dislike the clause, it would be some ground for believing there would be an important limitation of the power of the Board of Trade. Otherwise, what it came to was this, that the House was asked to authorise the supersession of Parliament in reference to this particular matter. He regarded it as a very serious request from the point of view of the private interests involved in the territory below the line fixed by the Bill. It was a very serious thing to say to people who had built their works on the faith that they were going to be submitted to the ordinary risks of the law, and who knew that their property could not be taken from them compulsorily, apart from these provisions, without an inquiry before an impartial Committee of the House, and, if necessary, the other House : “ The whole of that security on which you have built your works and laid out your money is to be taken away and you are to be remitted to the decision of any officer of the Board of Trade, not only at the present time but in future." That was a very serious thing from the point of view of private interests and a very important change to make in the position of those who had invested large sums of money in the land affected. But, apart from that, it was utterly wrong from the point of view of the Department. Here was a great undertaking, the greatest of its kind he supposed in the country. It had been set up under conditions which many people in that House—he did not share the view himself—regarded as of a very experimental character and by no means certain to be a success as the Bill was at present drafted. Surely it was more important than in any other case that Parliament should have control and supervision over the proceedings of a body of that kind. They ought to know and to have an opportunity of considering any great expenditure, any considerable change which the body proposed to be set up should authorise in future. He certainly thought if anybody was to be treated in an exceptional way it was not certainly a body of this kind, of enormous wealth and resources, and of a very experimental character. There was no reason in the world that could be given why the Port of London should have this exceptional privilege which would not be far more applicable to the smallest undertaking in the country, and yet nobody he supposed would suggest that it should be given to any private or semi-public company which came to ask for powers of this description. A great deal was made before the Committee of the light railway precedent. It was said that after all what was being done in this Bill was only copying what was done by the Light Railway Act of 1896. He was very glad the right hon. Gentleman had not repeated that argument, because it was really utterly worthless and wholly misleading. The Light Railway Act was a wholly different proposal, passed in order to assist poor agricultural districts where expenditure was necessarily likely to be of a very small character, and far greater safeguards were put into that Act than were proposed in this clause. There was to be an inquiry before what was substantially equal to, at any rate, a Committee of that House.

Lord R. Cecil.

A very strong Commission was constituted, with Lord Jersey at the head and an engineer and a lawyer to assist him, and every proposal for a light railway had to go before it and be sanctioned and confirmed by the Board of Trade. There were also far greater precautions with reference to notice than were proposed here. If they put aside this precedent the proposal was absolutely unprecedented. No single instance had come before Parliament of a proposal to give to a great body a special power such as this, and if it was done at all it should not be done in the case of a body of great resources and strength, which was exactly the body to be least injured by being forced to come to Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken as if an undertaking of this kind might be hampered because it could not buy a small piece of land or make some trifling alteration in its works without a Provisional Order. But such a great undertaking would perpetually have great changes, the very things which the right hon. Gentleman thought ought not to be done by Board of Trade order. The practice was to keep these small things back for a year or do them without Parliamentary authority. They were then all put into a Bill and confirmed in one Provisional Order which was passed every other year and the whole thing was disposed of without any additional expense. He very seriously pressed the Government not to persist in this proposal. It was a serious precedent which would arouse a great deal of opposition to the Bill.

SIR EDWIN CORNWALL (Bethnal Green, N. E.) said he did not follow the statement that this was exactly the body which ought to be compelled to come to Parliament whenever it required power to purchase land. It seemed to him it was exactly the body that ought not to have that burden placed upon it. The noble Lord would consider it a calamity that the Metropolitan boroughs exercised compulsory powers of taking land. It did not seem to be altogether a new principle.

LORD R. CECIL said it was very carefully limited to widening existing streets. It was necessarily of a very small character.

SIR EDWIN CORNWALL said that bore out his point. It was very wisely limited to the powers and duties of the authorities, and this clause was limited to the powers and duties of the authority. It seemed to be an exactly similar case. This was a most valuable clause to the new Port Authority. So far as one could judge, the House, irrespective of party, was agreed that this new Port Authority ought to be set up and London ought to be given the chance to bring the trade of the Port up to a higher level. He did not suppose anyone would suggest that the new authority was likely to be a predatory body, and to try to take land regardless of those who had invested in it, or that, with the protection of the Board of Trade, anything was likely to happen under the clause other than what would be advantageous to the new Port Authority. It was not child's play. It was not going to be an easy business for the new authority to come in and take over the whole of the docks of London, the duties of the Thames Conservancy, and the whole responsibility of the heavy debt which would be placed upon them to work out the salvation of the Port of London. Directly the new Port Authority found it wanted a piece of land for any purpose it would have to come to Parliament. The noble Lord opposite said that that was a good thing, and that Parliament ought to control this new authority. Personally he did not think Parliament ought to do anything of the kind. Why should a small body of men in the carrying out of their duties always be coming to Parliament? He had had a long experience on the London County Council and the Thames Conservancy Board, and he knew what coming to Parliament meant. It meant that the officers of the Port Authority, instead of going on with their work and devoting their whole time and energies to the service of the new authority, would have their time taken up obtaining permission from Parliament upon such matters as obtaining a piece of land for a dock. The officers of the new authority ought to be able to devote all their time and energy to the real business of the Port of London. If some very large undertaking had to be entered into it might be worth the while of the Port Authority to spend a great deal of time getting the permission of Parliament. The new authority would be placed more under the control of a Government Department than any other similar authority, and it would be a fatal mistake to press opposition to this clause. He hoped the House would decide to give the new authority a fair and good chance of carrying out successfully the duties entrusted to it by Parliament.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) said he would like to ask the President of the Board of Trade what point was represented geographically on the River Thames by subsection (a).

MR. CHURCHILL was understood to say that it would exempt all land west of Barking Creek.

SIR GILBERT PARKER admitted that the clause had much to be said for it, because it certainly relieved them of some very strong objections which they had hitherto felt regarding the supreme authority and plenary powers given to the Port Authority. He was not speaking in any spirit of antagonism to the Bill, and he would be quite satisfied if what the President of the Board of Trade intended was carried out. He understood that private owners were going to be protected, but he wished to point out that there were some competitive private owners who would be in competition with the Port Authority itself. The Board of Trade in subsection (2) took precautions to prevent the Port Authority from abusing, however innocently, their great plenary powers by taking from private owners land and property which might be in competition with the very interests which the Port Authority represented. He hoped the President of the Board of Trade appreciated his point. He would take, for example, the P. & O. Company. That company owned a considerable amount of land which he believed they intended to make use of by erecting buildings upon it. The P. & O. Company were very much unsettled by the power to be given under this Bill to the Port Authority to acquire land compulsorily. The President of the Board of Trade said they were providing that in the acquisition of any very large piece of land or any very important piece of property the Board of Trade might decide whether it should be compulsorily acquired, or whether the new authority should come to Parliament in order to secure the right to acquire that property. He understood that it was only small pieces of property and small interests which would be dealt with independently of Parliament. He did not think the subsection was quite clear, and he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer who, from the beginning had been most reasonable, would see that the very thing that the right hon. Gentleman was always so strong about when he was sitting in Opposition—that Parliament should always be supreme, that the voice of the people should be heard, and that all interests should be safeguarded by an appeal to Parliament—was being disregarded, and that they were placing the whole responsibility upon the Board of Trade itself or upon its appointee. The Board of Trade said they were going to have an impartial person, and he supposed that the word “person” under an Act of Parliament might mean several persons.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): It includes persons.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said there still remained absolutely in the hands of the Department the power to decide whether any application by the Port Authority to acquire property was large enough to warrant a reference to Parliament. Whatever confidence he might have in the permanent officials of the Board of Trade or the representative of the Unionist Party or of the Liberal Party at the head of that Department, he was opposed to giving power to any public Department to deal arbitrarily with any expenditure of money or the acquisition of property without Parliamentary control, because that was bureaucratic. This was a bureaucratic clause, and it was throwing more and more upon the administration of the Port Authority. The noble Lord the Member for Marylebone made a suggestion which he hoped the President of the Board of Trade would accept, and that was that some limit should be put upon the value of the purchase which the Board of Trade might authorise. Suppose they limited the property to be acquired with the consent of the Board of Trade to £100,000 and provided that anything to a greater value than that should not be acquired compulsorily without reference to Parliament. It might be found necessary to place the limit at £200,000, but he thought there ought to be a safeguard of some kind inserted in the clause. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman would find after the discussion they had had upon this point that the view which his noble friend had presented would have a response outside the House much more pronounced than the Government had any idea of. There were many interests involved, and the Government ought not to lose sight of the fact that the Port Authority would be a rival in the exploitation of river interests and acquiring property with private organisations, and the suspicion which existed among private organisations and river companies owning wharves and jetties was very great. That suspicion would not be allayed by this clause, excellent as it was in intention, because it did not go far enough or satisfy those who raised objection to the plenary powers which were being given to the Port Authority without reference to Parliament.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: There will be an independent inquiry.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said he was very doubtful about an independent inquiry unless it meant something more than sending down an official of the Board of Trade. Did it mean that?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said the President of the Board of Trade had already made it clear that it did not mean simply an inquiry by an official of the Board of Trade.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said he apologised to the President of the Board of Trade if he had misrepresented him. He understood they were going to send down an impartial person or persons to make the inquiry, and he did not think that promise was quite sufficient. The person appointed to inquire might be a colonel, or some one who might or might not know much about finance. While this Bill pretended to be a solution of a good many things it was not quite clear enough in its definitions. He appealed to the President of the Board of Trade to consider what the effect would be in the country, and especially on the commercial and industrial population on the river. The right hon. Gentleman had shown from the beginning that he did not wish to be in any way tyrannical in dealing with the river interests. He was anxious as President of the Board of Trade that the Port Authority should not have power which was too arbitrary. He himself believed still that the power proposed to be given under subsection (3) was too arbitrary, and if that was not so with respect to the Port Authority itself, the arbitrary power still remained with the Board of Trade. If the Unionist Party were in office, the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues would not trust them. [Cries of "Oh."] They did not trust them in connection with the administrative departments with full and unlimited confidence. The right hon. Gentleman himself would be the first to say that he did not think the Board of Trade ought to have this discretionary authority, and that there should be some limitation to its discretion. The power to purchase should be clearly restricted to an amount beyond which it should not be able to go without applying to Parliament. He urged the right hon. Gentleman to agree to insert some words in the subsection which would restrict the amount which the Board of Trade would have the option, as it were, of authorising in regard to the purchase of any given property without an application to Parliament. It might be £100,000, £200,000, or £300,000, but some amount should be stated so that the country would know the limit beyond which the Port Authority and the Board of Trade could not go without the sanction of Parliament. He begged the right hon. Gentleman to give that point his careful consideration.

MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) asked whether it was intended to give effect to the promise made on behalf of the Board of Trade at an earlier stage of the Bill that corporations which had acquired lands under Act of Parliament, and which might not be particularly using those lands, should be exempt from what might be called the administrative order procedure created by this Bill.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE thought it was desirable that a statement should be made on that point. His right hon. friend had prepared an Amendment on this subject, and it was now in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman on the other side. It was of a very drastic character and covered all undertakings of that kind. It was proposed by that Amendment to exclude from the operation of the clause lands which had been acquired under Act of Parliament for the purpose of railways or other undertakings. He quite saw the force of the contention of those who maintained that a mere order made by the Board of Trade should not over-ride an Act of Parliament, and for that reason they proposed to exclude all lands of that kind.

MR. RUSSELL REA (Gloucester) said the noble Lord opposite had expressed regret that he had not had an opportunity of refreshing his memory in regard to the proceedings before the Joint Committee. He should like to refresh his memory. This was not the clause which was rejected by the Joint Committee; it was with a little modification the clause which was accepted by them. It was a surprise to himself that the Board of Trade dropped the clause, and then, thinking better of it, reinserted it. The Committee altered the clause by depriving the Board of Trade of the power to make a Departmental Order. The Committee accepted the provision that land might be taken by Provisional Order.

LORD R. CECIL: My objection is to ousting Parliament altogether. I have no real objection to proceeding by Provisional Order.

MR. RUSSELL REA said the bureaucratic method was rejected by the Joint Committee. The Provisional Order provided for under this clause was not to extend to all purchases. It had excluded very small properties. He could not say that the Committee approved of that, but he himself did approve of the qualification. He could not conceive that any purchase, such as the hon. Member for Gravesend mentioned, of a property to the value of £200,000 or £300,000 could ever be sanctioned by the order of an administrative board. It would, of course, come under the purview of the House in the form of a Provisional Order. The clause as it now stood gave greater advantages to landowners and third parties than when it was passed by the Joint Committee. He thought the introduction of an independent arbitrator gave perfect security to third parties who might be interested. He could conceive of only one class of persons who might suffer in the least, and that was those who were interested in the costly and cumbrous procedure of Private Bill legislation. Individually, he should prefer this revised clause to the original clause as it was altered by the Joint Committee in Westminster Hall.

*MR. W. PEARCE (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) said that in discussing this clause the Committee appeared to be losing sight of the most important fact that the new Port Authority would at once come into possession of much vacant land now the property of the Dock Companies. Future purchases would thus be within very narrow limits. As to Tilbury Dock and the Albert Dock, it was evident that the possibility was most remote that the Port Authority would require any extension of land there, but they might require to get hold of some fringes of land adjoining them. Therefore, this clause was likely to be of considerable service to them. At the same time he did not think there could be any risk to the general public. He spoke feelingly because he happened to be a member of a firm of manufacturers with works on the river side, and if the clause were applied to any great extent, it would not be for the public benefit. He thought the House was viewing this clause with too much concern. They should allow it to pass, and get to the other parts of the Bill.

MR. W. GUINNESS (Bury St. Edmunds) desired to express the very strong objection which the London County Council felt against this clause as it had been put down by the President of the Board of Trade. He quite recognised that it was rather less drastic in its present form than when it was considered by the Joint Committee; but still it had not been modified sufficiently to abate the considerable amount of alarm felt by the London County Council. They had been told by the hon. Member for Bethnal Green, who had knowledge of these matters, that it was undesirable that the Port Authority should have to ask for Parliamentary powers to acquire small pieces of land, and that some clause of the kind was necessary. He agreed, but he thought that it would be best if the clause were put back to the form approved by the Joint Committee; that was to say to re-insert that a Provisional Order was necessary, and not merely an Order of the Board of Trade. The proposal of the President of the Board of Trade to limit what might be spent in buying land did not, he thought, necessarily meet the danger; because it might be quite possible for the Port Authority to buy a large quantity of small properties and by that method get beyond the statutory limit.

THE CHAIRMAN said it seemed to him that hon. Members were talking about Amendments to the clause. Would it not be better to read the clause a second time, and after that had been disposed of, the points of detail could be raised.

MR. WALTER GUINNESS said it was rather difficult to know in what way they were to vote, unless they got the opinion of the Government as to the different suggestions which had been made to meet the difficulty. Two had already been referred to; he had a third, which was to proceed by Provisional Order.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said that the various suggestions made by hon. Members were down on the Paper in the form of Amendments to the clause, one in the name of the hon. Member who had just spoken. He submitted that it was desirable to proceed with these Amendments after the formal Second Reading had been given to the clause.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood) said he objected to the principle of this clause, on the ground that it gave, for no sufficient reason which had yet been shown, unprecedented and almost unlimited powers to the Board of Trade. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green had said that it would be a most disadvantageous thing if the new Port Authority had to come to Parliament every time it wished to carry out some particular work, and his view was that there should be no restriction on the Board of Trade's giving the authority to do so. For his part he entirely objected to any authority, public or private, being able to deal with private interests, or indeed with public interests, without coming either directly or indirectly to Parliament for authority to do so. The President of the Board of Trade had said that the boundary had been fixed so as to exclude the great bulk of the building land around the Port from the operation of the clause. He had examined the map and marked off the boundary—the meridian six minutes East of Greenwich—and found that so far from the great bulk of the building land being excluded it was included within the operation of this clause. Moreover, the clause did not merely deal with the acquisition of land on the river side for docks, quays, wharves, jetties, piers, and buildings, but railways and other works in connection therewith. In other words, land might be taken compulsorily without Parliament being consulted, not merely for buildings and riverside works, but for railways which might involve the acquisition of any amount of land not directly on the river. He hoped he was not unreasonable in his attitude in regard to the matter. He thought the Bill was on the whole a most admirable one, and he earnestly desired to see it pass; but there was no sufficient reason for departing from the recognised practice which required the authority of Parliament for compulsory acquisition of property. The Bill conferred enormous, and, as he held, mischievous powers on a Government Department; and, as had been said by one hon. Member, there was too much Board of Trade in the Bill. The President of the Board of Trade had said that the Board would appoint an impartial person to hold an inquiry, but everybody knew that any Government Department was not unwilling to increase the powers given to it by this House, and he thought it was not a proper system that the decision of a question involving the position taken by the Board of Trade should be given to anyone appointed by the Board of Trade itself. He maintained that if any matter was to be inquired into it should be done not by a person appointed by the Board of Trade but by a person appointed in the ordinary way by the parties to the transaction. It was all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to say that large transactions would never be sanctioned under this clause. Why not? What guarantee was there that they would not be? The only security against that would be the decision of the Department itself. There was no reason why the House should abrogate its functions in favour of the Board of Trade, and for this wholly exceptional procedure being applied to a Government Department. His objection might be met if the powers to be given to the Board of Trade were confined to small matters.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said he trusted that the Committee would now come to a decision on the Second Reading of the clause, and then proceed to the examination of the details when the Amendments on the Paper were moved. Every hon. Member who had spoken, including the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, had accepted the principle of the clause. The noble Lord had admitted that it was desirable that there should be a cheap method of acquiring land, although his method was different from that of the Government. What was the object of the clause? It was to render it unnecessary for the Port Authority to come to Parliament whenever they wanted a few acres of land for the purpose of increasing the facilities of the Port. Coming to Parliament in order to obtain a private Bill meant enormous expense. It meant that every time general questions could be raised. The noble Lord knew that if a railway company came to Parliament for a few acres of land for the purpose of a railway siding or an extension, the whole question of the rates would be raised.

LORD R. CECIL said that that was done in Committee and not in the House.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE agreed; but why should the Port Authority every time it wanted a few acres of land to increase the accommodation of the Port have to come to Parliament for powers? The noble Lord said, "Look at Liverpool and other ports in the Kingdom; everybody knew from experience what they did. They saved up these little things, and did not bring in a Bill every time they wanted to acquire a few acres of land; they waited until a sufficient number of such requirements had accumulated to justify the trouble and expense entailed by coming to Parliament and promoting a private Bill to obtain the necessary powers. But that was not once a year, or every two years, or three years." How often did the noble Lord imagine that the Port of Liverpool had been coming to Parliament with these Bills? Not very often; he remembered one Bill. What did the noble Lord suggest? He suggested that when the Port Authority wanted a few acres of land for an extension, they were to wait for years until there was an accumulation of these needs before they came to Parliament. Really that was not necessary. Here was a great Port, the greatest Port in the world, which must suffer inconvenience, at all events, to that extent, because they would not have the power to acquire the land when they wanted it unless they came to Parliament. Why should they not get it when they wanted it, instead of having to wait, as they would have to do, perhaps for a long time, if the view of the noble Lord was adopted? Besides, the expense of going before a Parliamentary Committee was enormous, as it rendered necessary payment of very expensive counsel and expert witnesses. He made no imputation on the noble Lord when he said he took the traditional view of the Parliamentary barrister as to the desirability of bringing everything upstairs. That, however, meant the piling on of expense, and anybody who wished to inconvenience the Port Authority, or, still worse, anyone who wanted a big price out of them, would be glad of this procedure. Very often these proceedings upstairs were blackmailing proceedings, and were fought simply in order to get a big price from the company promoting a Bill. People objected very often because they knew they would get a very big price from the company in order to get them out of the way. This was done deliberately, and Parliament ought not to be a sort of huge blackmailing machine for the purpose of extracting extravagant prices out of great commercial and industrial enterprises. High railway rates were now being paid, largely as a result of the railway companies being compelled to come to Parliament every time they needed power to build a station for the convenience of the public, or to form a crossing, or to widen their line. There should be some cheap method by which they could secure authority on paying fair value in respect of the property affected. Why should they adopt the present method which involved very great expenditure in regard to compulsory purchase? He maintained that it was the business of Parliament to help this Port Authority to acquire the land which they might need as cheaply and expeditiously as possible, in order to enable it to do its work. The noble Lord quoted the precedent of the Light Railways Act under which people did not have to come to Parliament every time they wanted land for a light railway. The noble Lord said that simply because Lord Jersey happened to be on the Light Railways Commission, it was not a question of principle with him, but merely of a particular person who administered the particular Act.

AN HON. MEMBER: Lord Jersey is not on the Commission now.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said he was not saying a word disparaging of Lord Jersey, who was a very admirable, worthy, and judicial man, but surely there were plenty of men in this country who were able to administer an Act of this kind judicially, and with the utmost impartiality. A Government Department would direct an inquiry in the circumstances mentioned in the clause, but as everybody knew perfectly well, would not interfere with a judicial investigation of that sort, or overrule such an inquiry.

LORD R. CECIL said that similar inquiries had been over-ruled more than once.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said Government Departments would never interfere in such an inquiry, and if it over-ruled the result it would only be in the very interests which the noble Lord wished to press upon Parliament and the Committee. Supposing the Commissioner decided that it was a case for Parliamentary inquiry, the noble Lord surely did not imagine that the Board of Trade would overrule that. They could not face Parliament under such circumstances. His right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade, who was very well acquainted with the clause as drafted, assured him that the Department could not over-rule the decision of a Commissioner, after a judicial inquiry, that a particular case was one which should come before Parliament, in the sense of making an order in spite of his decision. If there was any doubt about that his right hon. friend wished to make the point clear, and, if necessary, would insert an Amendment to do so. If the Commissioner reported in favour of an order being made the Board of Trade might over-rule that, but surely the noble Lord would not complain of that. Really the Government were not proposing anything nearly so strong as the Light Railways Act, which was proposed by a Conservative Government, and which gave certain powers to Commissioners, with an appeal to the Board of Trade.

LORD R. CECIL said the right hon. Gentleman was inaccurate. He did not want to go into the details of the Light Railways procedure, but as a matter of fact if the Light Railways Commission rejected an application his impression was that there was no recourse at all. Certainly there was practically none.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said if the noble Lord said so he would not dispute it as he knew that he had more practical experience than he himself had of the working of that Act. He would take it that they adopted the same procedure here. They did not propose to take power to override the decision of the Commissioners. The power proposed to be given was conferred on every Continental port; he had never heard of a case where it was not.

SIR GILBERT PARKER did not like to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but he thought it would help the Committee if he could elicit some information. There was a particular provision in the clause under which there might or might not be a provisional order. There was to be one if it appeared to the Board of Trade that by reason of the extent or situation of the land proposed to be acquired compulsorily it ought not to be taken without the sanction of Parliament. What he should like to hear was what the right hon. Gentleman considered a large extension and what would be considered a small one.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said the Board of Trade were proposing to put a very considerable limitation upon the clause, and to restrict the power to operations of a very small character. The hon. Gentleman suggested a limitation of value, but he would tell him at once why a limitation of value would not really assist him on the point whether a particular operation was of importance in its effect upon other interests. He could understand an operation which would be a small one in value being a very considerable one in importance. They might have a very small operation which by its effect upon the navigation of the river might seriously affect other interests either above or below the place where it was made. Therefore, his first objection to the limitation was that it really did not meet the case which had been put by the Opposition. A £50,000 transaction might be regarded as small, but might turn out to involve a most important operation, whereas £500,000 might refer to a very trivial operation as it might have regard to a large tract of waste land, the acquisition of which did not affect anybody, the only question being one of price. It might not affect the navigation of the river or the riverside trader and might belong to somebody who was very glad to get rid of it at a price. A large transaction might therefore be a very small one from the point of view of importance, and a small transaction might be a very serious one. Therefore, he suggested that value was not the best criterion in a matter of this kind. How, moreover, were they to get at the value? They might send someone down to sit in judgment upon it, and he might say he did not think it was worth more than £100,000. He was not an expert, and the value was not fixed by one until after the order of the Board of Trade had been issued. When the valuation under the Lands Clauses Acts came it might be discovered that land which was thought worth only £80,000 was worth £150,000. What was to happen then: were they to go back to another inquiry and begin afresh?

SIR GILBERT PARKER: You may take it into account.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Who may take it into account?

SIR GILBERT PARKER: The Commissioner will take it into account.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: But he does not decide the price. If the whole matter was to be carried through and it was discovered under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts that the land was of much more value, that was a very serious thing. It was no use to put in a clause of this kind unless it was going to be operative. To say they were exceedingly anxious to give the authority full powers to buy the land cheaply and expeditiously, and then to hedge it round with all sorts of restrictions and conditions of this kind would be futile. He thought the Board of Trade had gone just as far as they could, and that there was ample protection afforded under the clause. The last subsection was a much better guarantee than the value because, as he had pointed out, there would be pieces of land so situated that they were small in value.

MR. BOWLES asked whether, supposing Parliament took the view that this was a thing of a large character and that they ought to be consulted and the Board of Trade took the opposite view, would the order be a provisional one. Under this section he submitted not.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE pointed out that hon. Members would have the check upon the Government which they had in every Act of Parliament. That was the only check they ever could have either in this or any other Act. The Board of Trade was as free from prejudice as any department he knew of, and was perfectly impartial. They appointed an expert to examine into this matter and he having considered all the circumstances decided whether the thing should be brought before Parliament or whether an order ought to be made.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) asked whether the last subsection was not governed by the words, "If it appears," which gave only a discretion to the Board of Trade.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE replied that his right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade was going to move words which would meet the point raised by the hon. Baronet, and make it perfectly clear that it was not merely discretionary, but that the Board of Trade was compelled by the Act to exclude cases of that character. He appealed to the House to bring this discussion to a conclusion and get to the details of the clause, as everyone agreed that it was desirable to acquire cheap land.

MR. RENWICK (Newcastle-on-Tyne), speaking in the interests of those engaged in river and wharf traffic, which represented nearly half the shipping trade of the Port, said they viewed with the greatest apprehension the object of this clause, which was, clearly, to leave to the Board of Trade the decision of very important matters affecting the interest of the whole of the traders of London. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Trade had endeavoured to prove that the clause was intended to deal only with small matters. He ventured to point out, with all deference to these right hon. Gentlemen, that it meant something more the purchase of an acre of land for the purpose. The clause provided for the building and construction of jetties and wharves, and, in view of the increased size of ships, any dock which the Port Authority might build hereafter would be built on a few acres of land, but it would require many acres of land. It was, obviously, a large matter, and, on such a matter, the Authority ought to be compelled to come to Parliament. The President of the Board of Trade said the object of this clause was to enable the Authority to create a dock which should be able to compete with the great Continental ports. The Authority would, no doubt, regard the scheme with a light heart, but they must remember that that scheme would have to be paid for. He sincerely trusted the President of the Board of Trade would give them some guarantee that if the scheme exceeded a certain limit of money, the Authority must obtain Parliamentary sanction to spend more than £100,000. If they had a guarantee that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to return to the Board of Trade or the President of the Board of Trade was going to remain there, then they might have confidence in them, but from past experience the commercial community had not that confidence in the Government which right hon. Gentlemen seemed to think, and as in the near future there might be a change at the Board of Trade, they hoped they would grant the guarantee made to them and make some limit of any rate beyond which that new Authority should not go without the sanction of Parliament.

ROWLANDS (Kent, Dartford) asked the request which had been made by hon. Members opposite, that the limit should be put in the clause. He listened to the whole of the debate, and felt that the objections that had been raised to this new clause had not been answered. All those who supported the clause seemed to look upon these matters as trifling matters. He, on the other hand, was of opinion that the clause would be of great magnitude. The clause would give the Authority the power to go to new places where the Government had no docks whatever. If they intended to undertake anything in the area specifically marked out below Barking Creek they would have to make new docks and new gates and loading wharves, and things of that sort. Under those circumstances there ought to be some assurance from the President of the Board of Trade that the expenditure which might be incurred outside the control of Parliament would be limited. All those traders who were outside the London area and who were already paying double rates for their goods looked with great fear on the new Authority having these uncontrolled powers.

SIR GILBERT PARKER pointed out that the explanations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the result of the inquiry were not quite clear. He wished to ask whether the Board of Trade would feel themselves bound by the decision of the Commissioner, either for or against a scheme. If the Commissioner said it was a small scheme and need not go before Parliament, or if he said it was one which ought to be sanctioned by Parliament, would they accept his decision without question? In other words would he be an expert the opinion of whom the Board of Trade would be bound to accept?

MR. CHURCHILL: I think I can reassure the hon. Gentleman. There is great difficulty in fixing a numerical financial limit. I do not say the difficulty is absolutely insuperable, but I do believe that it would be a disadvantage and would work inconveniently to insist on a precise and exact limit. One must assume a degree of common-sense and integrity among the parties engaged in carrying out judicial or semi-judicial functions. In the first place, the question of the dispensing power, as I will call it, has to be decided by an impartial person. If that person decides that it is not a case for the exercise of the dispensing power but that it must come by the regular method to Parliament, the Board of Trade would, under the Amendment I propose to move, have no power to overrule that decision. If, on the other hand, the impartial person decides that, in the circumstances, it is a proper case to be dealt with by the dispensing power, the Board of Trade may, as a result of pressure in this House or of Parliamentary attention being directed to the matter, or of a reconsideration of the whole subject, over-rule the decision of the impartial person and place the whole matter before Parliament.

SIR F. BANBURY said he should like to support his noble friend against the clause. He did not see how it would be possible without a limit—

THE CHAIRMAN: There is a specific Amendment as to the limit, and that matter would better be discussed then.

SIR F. BANBURY said the reason why he wished to vote against the clause was that he conceived it was going to be a distinctly bad precedent. He did not doubt that the new authority would probably do its work well, but they must not forget that a new authority, animated by a desire to make its work successful, might be led away into undertaking big works which, when completed, would be unsuccessful and place a large further expenditure on the Port. There was no question but that in the City of London there was a great fear that the Bill would put a large expense on the people who used the Port, and he did not want to do anything which would in any way tend to increase that expenditure, and he believed that if they passed this clause the result would be to increase the expenditure which so many people in the City feared. If they did not pass the clause the only result would be that the Port Authority would have to come to Parliament. It might cost them something to do that, but the money they would save by bringing their matters before Parliament and allowing the public to discuss them was, in his opinion, likely to outweigh any possible disadvantage arising from the fact that they might have to pay a few fees to counsel and persons of that sort. If Parliament were to abrogate its powers of revision and give them to all these different authorities, they might just as well do away with Parliament altogether. It was no use saying that the new Port Authority was a commercial body and not likely to abuse their powers. It was a question of precedent, and local authorities would desire to have the same powers as the Port Authority. The argument could be advanced that the local authorities were the directly elected representatives of the people and that they could not refuse to give them powers which they had given to a commercial undertaking. He did not want to allude to the Poor Law guardians and to a variety of cases such as that which had lately been before the public, but he would just mention that they would do well to keep these powers in their own hands. It was because they desired that Parliament should not part with its authority in a bureaucratic direction that he and his friends opposed this clause. The Chancellor of the Exchequer talked about 5,000 acres. Was it contemplated, then, that 5,000 acres were going to be taken and developed into docks? If so, that opened up a vista which all those interested in the matters would regard with grave concern. Under these circumstances he had no option but to vote against the clause.

*MR. MORTON (Sutherland) thought they had reason to complain as to the manner in which this matter had been brought on that day, because they were given to understand that it would not come on before next Thursday. He was now told that they were considering an Amendment which was not on the Paper, and he knew nothing of it. No hint was given until late the previous night that the Bill was coming on. In regard to this particular clause, the Amendment ought to have been on the Paper. He dared say it was important but he did not know. He did know, however, that the clause as it stood was an exceedingly wild one, and that it gave power to the Board of Trade as to the Port Authority to speculate with other people's money in any way they chose. He had got to bear in mind this—he might not have much sympathy from the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London—that, in certain circumstances, the Board of Trade might call upon people to pay for all the things by putting a tax on their land. Subsection (a) of the new clause would enable the Port Authority to do almost anything they liked, and all the protection the public would have would be, apparently, the Board of Trade. He sorry to say that the Board of Trade never much protection, because they found out things as a rule after they happened and did not do much to prevent them. He was not making in any way personal to the present President of the Board, but they must rely too much on the Board of Trade, because he had found in so many things that they did not find them out in time of any use. He remembered years ago that the House was asked to allow a railway embankment to be placed across the parish of Berse, and that almost cut the parish in two; that was allowed to be done by the Board of Trade, and the authorities afterwards had to find a way to open it up. It was only the other day noticed, with regard to an accident on a tube railway, that the Board of Trade had issued a long report in which it said there were a lot of things that ought to have been done to prevent that accident, but they never lifted a finger to get those tube railways being built to get those matters carried out. There was a reason why they should, as far as possible, preserve their liberty to resist, before these wild speculations and schemes were carried out or put into effect, that they should have the unity in that House of objecting to them. They should be very carefully with regard to an authority like the proposed Port of London Authority, which would not be a representative body like the London County Council, but would be a closed body. The President of the Board of Trade refused to provide that the Authority should be open to the public, and everything could be decided on secretly. So far as the members were concerned they were to be elected, not to look after the public but to look after their own private perhaps selfish ends. Therefore, they should take care that people were protected. The only object in the powers conferred by this Bill must be to set up competition to private undertakings, because one of the objects of the authority in buying the land was to wipe out of existence the enterprise which, after all, had made the Port of London what it was, and had done very considerable business in an economical way, and had made it and kept London the cheapest port in the world, whereas in all probability this Bill would make it the dearest. The main business of the Port of London was to supply food to the millions of inhabitants, and that was all the more reason why the public should be adequately protected.

"Any order made under this section authorising the purchasing and taking of land otherwise than by agreement shall incorporate the Lands Clauses Acts as if the order were a special Act within the meaning of those Acts."

They had never heard any explanation of that. He was told that there was an Amendment to be moved. The authority was to be authorised to purchase land otherwise than by agreement, so that they would be able to do exactly what they liked with anybody, perhaps for the reason they wished to cover up the deficiency that would be caused by the extraordinary price they proposed to give for the docks.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN pointed out that they were not discussing the Bill as a whole, and the clause now being considered was to enable the authority to construct certain works. On the Second Reading of the clause they could not go into questions of detail which would have to be dealt with by Amendments after the clause had been read a second time.

*MR. MORTON said he desired to obey the ruling of the Chair. He was very sorry that he could not go into the clause as it stood on the Paper. He was only trying to show the danger to the people concerned under the powers to be given by this clause. If he was assured that he could go into details in Committee he would not pursue the matter just now.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: You can go into details on Amendments moved by yourself or others; you cannot go into details on the clause itself.

MR. CHURCHILL: There will be opportunities to address the House on the Report stage.

*MR. MORTON said it might depend on the Government Whips whether there was any opportunity. He understood that unless Amendments were moved he could not discuss the details. With great respect he was only reading the various subsections and commenting on them as he found them on the Paper.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said that on the Second Reading of the clause they only discussed its principle as with the Second Reading of a Bill, and the details of the clause were dealt with in the ordinary way by Amendments, after which the Question would be put "that the clause, or the clause as amended, stand part of the Bill."

SIR F. BANBURY asked whether he was not right when he said that the Second Reading of a clause was conducted in the same way as the Second Reading of a Bill. A Member might give his reasons for moving the rejection of the Bill, and similarly with regard to the Second Reading of a clause. A Member could not go through the clause, line by line, or every word of every line, but he could generally give his reasons for objecting to what was in the clause just as with the Second Reading of a Bill, advancing arguments against the second Reading.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said that was just what he had stated.

*MR. MORTON said he was really trying generally to object to the clause; he was trying to explain his reasons in a general way, and for that reason he had passed over subsection (1) altogether, while he referred to others which he thought were vital so far as the Second Reading was concerned. He might say that he had no Amendments down with regard to the clause, therefore he did not propose to raise discussion by way of Amendment. But he did propose to object to the Second Reading of the clause, because it ought not to be passed in any shape or form unless it was so minimised that it would not be worth anything at all, like clauses that were often inserted in certain Bills. As far as he read the clause, and the power which it proposed to confer on the Port Authority, practically it was submitted with a view to proving that they were right in purchasing the docks. And the new powers were conferred in order to make the new Port Authority a success although everybody connected with it except the shareholders, knew that it would be a failure. Some of the matters contained in the clause would have to be done by Provisional Orders, and it was supposed that they would have the opportunity of discussing them. But this new authority was to be allowed to speculate in any way with other people's money and not their own. They were to sit with closed doors and tax the food of the people in order to find funds, then the very least that they should do was to come to Parliament and ask for what they wanted, so that those who represented the millions to be taxed might have an opportunity of saying why they objected. No explanation, to his knowledge, had ever been given why this clause was introduced at all. If an explanation had been given earlier when he was not present then his absence was the fault of the Government in misleading him as to what business was to come on that day. It was a matter of such vital importance that he trusted that the Government would give them some fair consideration, and not rush this through, as apparently they were doing, without proper notice to Members of the House.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said the President of the Board of Trade intended to move an Amendment dealing with the first words of subsection (3), authorising the appointment of a Commissioner. He wanted to know from the right hon. Gentleman whether an opportunity would occur on his Amendment for discussing the question of the authority of the Commissioner, the scope of his inquiry, and the subsequent action which would ensue on that inquiry. This was a very grave question, and they ought not to leave the Second Reading of the clause before they had some assurance on the point whether they would be able to discuss these matters on the Amendment, which they did not possess, and the wording of which they did not know.

MR. CHURCHILL: The hon. Member certainly discuss these questions. If I did not move my Amendment, it would be open to him to move one, or a similar Amendment in regard to the point to which he refers. But I would very respectfully appeal to the Committee to bring this discussion to a close so that we may get to the important Amendments which are on the Paper in the names of hon. Gentlemen below the way. I have tried very hard to do the general convenience of hon. Members, and the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone has frankly and generously recognised that the Government have fulfilled their pledge in a very ample manner. We have now engaged on this discussion for two and a half, and I hope that the Committee will now read the clause and time and resume that friendly business-like conduct of the Bill which so pleasantly marked its discussion when it last before the House.

MR. NIELD (Middlesex, Ealing) said the right hon. Gentleman had informed that if the Commissioner proposed to go on with the inquiry himself it was open to the Board of Trade to inter-

Would the right hon. Gentleman remove the safeguard that the order of the Commissioner should lie on the Table for thirty days so that it might be dealt with by Parliament in that period? That would give Parliament an opportunity, especially where there were any works dealt with under an order of the Commissioner, to call attention to the matter. He thought that after the remarks of the hon. Member for Sutherland, and in view of the powers conferred to tax others, they should have a safeguard that the order of the Commissioner should be allowed to lie on the Table for thirty days. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred to the difficulty of fixing a limit. It might not be a question of 5,000. Take this case. Supposing it might to divert the channel of the river where there was a sudden bend; a right cut through a piece of land was not very large, but was a matter where wharfingers and others would be interfered with. In such a case the amount of land involved would not be large, yet the consequences would be far-reaching.

Question put and agreed to.

MR. WHITEHEAD (Essex, S.E.), who had on the Paper the following Amendment: "To insert after the word 'thereupon,' the words 'after holding an inquiry at which all persons interested shall be heard'" said, that after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman he was not sure whether he should move that Amendment or not. They had not got on the Paper the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman himself was going to move, but if it covered the intention of his own Amendment he would not move it, but if it did not cover it, then he would. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would not mind stating to the House the precise words of his Amendment and what course he intended to take.

Amendment proposed to the proposed new clause—

"In line 9, after the word 'thereupon,' to insert the words 'after holding an inquiry at which all persons shall be heard.'—(Mr. Whitehead.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHURCHILL: My hon. friend has correctly anticipated the effect of the Amendment which I propose to move. That Amendment arranges for the holding of a public inquiry with respect to any acquisition of land. The hon. Member's Amendment proposes that an inquiry shall be held into all matters coming under the operation of the clause. I cannot agree to that, because it appears to me that it would be worse than useless to hamper the Port Authority with a public inquiry whenever they wish in the pursuance of their business even, for example, to put up houses for the accommodation of the labourers who may be working in connection with the London Docks. I think that it would be hampering the whole of the functions of the Port Authority. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman only wishes to have safeguards, and I think that he will see that we are going a long way to meet his views in favour of the obligation of holding a public inquiry in all cases where land is to be acquired.

MR. RENWICK asked whether it was proposed that the tribunal of inquiry should receive evidence from all parties concerned.

MR. CHURCHILL: A public inquiry will be held with all the advantages of publicity attendant upon a public inquiry. Certainly there will be power to take evidence; in fact there is an obligation to take evidence so far as is necessary to arrive at a true decision.

MR. RENWICK said the question was what right or power the parties interested had to give evidence.

MR. WHITEHEAD, after the explanation of the President of the Board of Trade, asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. WALTER GUINNESS (Bury St. Edmunds) moved an Amendment to insert at the end of line 10, the words "Provisional Order as provided in this section." The object of his Amendment, he said, was to reinstate the clause in the form in which it was when it was approved by the Joint Committee. He had several consequential Amendments down, and he supposed that it would be most convenient if he said a word or two about them on this Amendment, because if it were rejected it would not be possible for them to deal with its particular application under subsections (a), (b) and (c). By the first subsection the Board of Trade would be able to make an absolute Order—

"Authorising the construction and equipment of docks, quays, wharves, etc., as are specified in the Order."

That was a very dangerous provision, because in the case of railway companies and every other dock company, if they wanted to make works of this kind they had to get powers by way of private Bill legislation. He did not see why the Port of London should be in a different position from any other undertaking and be freed from the control of Parliament. Considerable alarm was caused to the London County Council by this provision, because the Board of Trade might allow a dock railway to be made under this subsection in places which would have a very bad effect on the general interests of London. Take an extreme case. They might authorise a dock to be made in the City if they were able to acquire the land by agreement. He thought that was a very dangerous extension of the Board of Trade powers, and that they should not be allowed to decide such questions without recourse to Parliament. Subsection (b) authorised the purchase and taking otherwise than by agreement of such land as might be specified in the Order. He did not think that the proposal to send down an official to make inquiry would really meet the case. They had been told that no official of the Board of Trade would be appointed; it would have to be an independent arbitrator. He thought that an independent arbitrator was less desirable than an official of the Board of Trade, because they knew that the Board of Trade would at all events have knowledge of precedents, whereas an independent person might not have a knowledge of the usual procedure or of the manner in which Parliament generally dealt with these matters. There undoubtedly would not be the same confidence in the decision of an inexperienced person of that kind as there would be in the decision of a Private Bill Committee of that House. They had had another concession promised, namely, that those undertakings which had got land under statutory powers would be exempted. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them that the undertaking of the London County Council at Crossness, where there were very extensive sewage works, would be exempted. No doubt this would cover the actual outfall works, but the London County Council wanted to extend those works, and a very much larger area would have to be taken eventually. If the Port Authority took the land which was required for sewage works, they ought to have some opportunity of laying their views before Parliament, or before some tribunal which would give it very careful consideration.

Mr. Churchill.

clause laid down that no land was to be acquired compulsorily to the east of a line running north and south through Barking Creek. Grays, Erith, and Gravesend, all to the eastward of this line, in one case there were cement works to which £7,000,000 of capital had been expended. It was most undesirable to give the Board of Trade power, if it was so exercised by an inexperienced person who might be down to make an inquiry, to jeopardise the prospects of large undertakings of this kind by taking the only course which might be suitable for their development. He thought the Board of Trade had admitted the danger of acquiring land compulsorily without reference to Parliament by this very proposal that they were only to do it east of this line through Barking Creek. It was not safe to do it to the west of Barking Creek why was it safe to do it to the east where there were four very large communities and great commercial interests at stake? The other place in which he wanted to insert the necessity of a Provisional Order was in subsection (b) as it stood would allow the Board of Trade to authorise dues, rates, and tolls in respect of the use of any works to be constructed. The dues, rates, and tolls which might be charged on an undertaking as bought from the companies were laid down in the Bill there was nothing in this subsection to limit these dues and tolls to the limits which were found necessary in the case of the rest of the dock undertakings. He thought that was undesirable as a very important question was to be the charges. The London after all was a matter of public interest, and he thought the Board of Trade ought to lay these tolls before Parliament, because it might quite easily be that the tolls might be so high as to be ill-advised in various respects and would be necessary to modify the order not to endanger the position of the Port. The only subsection which did not want a Provisional Order was subsection (d), and in that he was allowing the decision of the Joint Committee which considered the Bill to be binding on the Port Authority to charge as part of the cost of construction of any work, the interest on any money raised to defray the expense of construction. That was a power which might safely be exercised by the Board of Trade. On the general question he thought the Provisional Order was a means of procedure which involved very little expense to the Port authority. It might involve expense to those whose interests were affected, but that was reasonable enough. If they felt very strongly on the matter, they must be prepared to go to considerable expense in opposing the Provisional Order in Parliament. But he thought if the Board of Trade would only accept this small Amendment, they would really get all they wanted. They had been told that the Port Authority would not want to buy much land. If that was so, perhaps these matters would hardly arise, but he very strongly protested against the tendency of Government Departments to substitute their own initiative for the powers of Parliament. If this went through in its present form a great amount of disquiet would be caused not only in London but in those growing commercial districts to the east of London, and he was quite sure it would not be to the advantage of the Port Authority that at its inception all these interests should be alarmed and prejudiced against it.

Amendment proposed to the proposed new clause—

'In line 10, at the end, to insert the words "or a Provisional Order as provided in this section."'"—(Mr. Walter Guinness.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHURCHILL: The question before the Committee is a plain and simple one, because, after all, there is only this issue. Will Parliament give to the new Port Authority that easement and convenience, those facilities in the conduct of their business which are not denied to the great rival ports on the Continent, or will they not? As far as this proposal is concerned, I say, frankly, if I had to choose between accepting the Amendment and dropping the clause, I would drop the clause. I do not believe it would be of the slightest advantage to us. I am advised that it would be much better to revert to the regular system and deny the Port Authority the facilities which are now asked for once and for all. I am advised that procedure by Provisional Order would be just as uncertain, and practically as laborious. In small cases there would be smaller fees to be charged, but in large cases—in any case which raised controversial issues—you would actually have a dual inquiry, the Board of Trade inquiry and the whole Parliamentary procedure in both Houses, in Committee, and so forth. I am advised that that really would be a more inconvenient procedure than to leave it to the ordinary course. I submit to the Committee that although I think the proposal is ingenious, that I know is made in a conciliatory and helpful spirit, the consequences of our adopting it would be worse than the consequences of our not putting in this clause in which we are making great exertions in the interests of the Port authority.

LORD R. CECIL said he could not think the right hon. Gentleman had been correctly advised as to the respective merits of Provisional Order and private Act of Parliament. In the vast majority of cases where Provisional Orders were issued they went through without opposition. Cases of opposition occurred every session without doubt, but he should think they were not 10 per cent. of the Provisional Orders issued and the reason was clear. Where a Provisional Order was employed for the purpose of carrying out small public improvements which did not excite great feeling and opposition, after the local inquiry the Order was allowed to go through without further opposition. Where great interests were involved, and the only people who could tell whether great interests were involved were those who owned them, they were given an opportunity to appeal against the Government Department to Parliament, and they ought to be allowed it. Therefore, the Provisional Order really operated as a kind of sieve, selecting the really important cases for the consideration of Parliament and leaving those which were not of great importance for the consideration of the Department and determination by them. Therefore, he should think if they granted a Provisional Order it would be a very serious advantage to this body. The right hon. Gentleman thought existing conditions were necessary in order to enable competition to be carried out with Continental ports. But surely competition had to be carried out not only with Continental ports but with ports in this country, and he was not sure that it was legitimate to give to one great port a special advantage which they did not give to the others. It appeared to be a matter of very great doubt if it was in the interests of public policy to put one port in an exceptional position. He should certainly support the Amendment.

*SIR A. SPICER (Hackney, Central) said he was one of the Members of the Joint Committee, and a Member in an official position connected with the London Chamber of Commerce. He was one of those who did not care for the clause as originally put down. He now that the President of the Board of Trade had given them an intimation with regard to the two Amendments that he proposed to add, especially the one providing for a public inquiry, he was prepared to support the Government most heartily. He believed that the two Amendments would allay any real ground for suspicion on the part of those who had large interests in the Port of London, and who, in some cases, were competitors of the Port Authority themselves, and he thought now would have all need of protection.

MR. RENWICK thought the insertion of the words "Provisional Order" would allay a great deal of the alarm caused by the proposals of the clause but pointed out that while the dues on goods from beyond the seas were limited to one-fourth of their value, there was no stipulation as to the limit of dues on goods carried coastwise, and they might find themselves in the position that goods carried coastwise were saddled with more dues than those carried overseas. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to accept this Amendment. He had mentioned, not for the first time, that he wanted to give the Port Authority in London the same power as foreign authorities had over foreign ports.

nearly all large ports on the Continent were carried out by State grants and under the direct authority of the State, which was quite a different matter. Unless this question of Provisional Order was agreed to he was afraid the right hon. Gentleman would find that dissatisfaction in London and throughout the Port generally would continue instead of being allayed, and, therefore, he supported the Amendment.

MR. WHITEHEAD said he was reluctant to speak after having withdrawn his own Amendment a moment or two ago, but after the observations of the President of the Board of Trade it seemed to him that they stood in a very curious position. In his first speech, with every word of which he agreed, the right hon. Gentleman laid great stress upon the importance of protecting the Port Authority from the necessity of coming to Parliament when dealing with small parcels of land. He thought it was a very valuable principle that was introduced by the clause. But in his speech a moment ago the right hon. Gentleman said they were dealing with large cases. His speech in support of his present position was entirely inconsistent with the speech in support of the clause as a whole.

MR. CHURCHILL: I was very careful to make it clear that I meant the disadvantages of the Provisional Order system were greatest when the Provisional Order was considered to be of a controversial character—not necessarily that the issues were large, but were controversial in character, or were, perhaps, regarded as controversial by a small number. I do not admit that anything I have said in support of this Amendment has been inconsistent with anything I said before.

MR. WHITEHEAD hoped the right hon. Gentleman would acquit him of any desire to make a personal charge against him, but here they were dealing with very great and important private as well as public interests. So far as the debate had gone, the only assurance the House had that those interests would be properly safeguarded was the promise of the President, and he could not help thinking he was justified at this stage in probing as far as possible what was the real position of the Board of Trade in the matter. It had been said by the Chancellor that the land which would be dealt with was waste land. It was not the first or the second time that that word had been used. The county, a part of which he represented, had a large frontage on the river, and he was told the rateable value of the land which might be affected by the clause in that county alone was something like £3,000,000. They had there very large industrial businesses and important works of various kinds, as well as agricultural land which was by no means waste land, but was of very considerable value. If the Board of Trade looked up the records of the War Office they would find that the price paid for so-called waste land had been not inconsiderable. He looked at the clause to see whether it enabled the authority to deal with large cases. He did not want to give the word any unfair meaning, but in subsection (a) power was taken to construct docks and build railways. These were very large undertakings indeed. He did not think anything on that scale had ever been authorised hitherto except by private Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman would agree to limit the operation of the clause to the small cases indicated earlier in the debate, he would not press for a Provisional Order, but if he was going to take the position that the clause as it stood was verbally inspired and that no alteration would be permitted he should reluctantly be obliged to support the Amendment, because only in that way would the large private interests be sufficiently safeguarded.

MR. SEAVERNS (Lambeth, Brixton) realised most fully the great advantage of being able to acquire small parcels of land or other property without the expense of coming before Parliament by private Bill, but he felt there was great weight in the argument that the new authority was to have an exceptional, if not unprecedented, privilege and yet that that Port Authority was a new, an untried, and an experimental one. The authority was not only new and untried, but it was not yet even in existence. The first authority which would control the finances of the Port of London would be a nominated authority. The second, three years afterwards, which would be put in command of its fortunes, would be practically dictated to by the officials of the Board of Trade which had reserved to itself the right of laying down rules under which the franchise should be employed by the payers of dues. It appeared to him, therefore, that the House ought to be very careful before it parted with its ordinary rights in a matter such as this to an authority whose position was entirely unknown. Most of the speakers had referred to the rights of property and the injury which might result to them if the Port Authority took an arbitrary or an unreasonable view of its rights and privileges. But there was another side to the matter, and to his mind a far more important side, and that was the side which affected the rights and privileges and the risks and responsibilities attaching to those who provided the money for carrying out the schemes of the new Port Authority, and the necessary funds for the improvement of the Port of London. In the past an enormous amount of money had been sunk in unprofitable dock undertakings, and he thought it just as necessary that the interests of the payers of dues, those unfortunate and usually little-considered people who provided the money, should be considered and safeguarded against any rash or ill-advised operations on the part of the new Port Authority as that the interests of the owners of property should be borne in mind. Therefore, he was very sorry the President of the Board of Trade was not willing to put into the clause some definite financial limit which would, to his mind, carry into effect what he understood to be the right hon. Gentleman's own desire that special and unlimited authority should be given regarding small transactions only, and should not be extended to large transactions. That appeared to him to be a very natural course, and if the right hon. Gentleman was not able in some way to meet the point which had been advanced by his hon. friend, he should be reluctantly compelled to vote for the Amendment.

- MR. CHURCHILL said that if it would meet the views of the whole of the Committee and enable them to progress he would be prepared to consider the question of a fixed limit.

MR. BOWLES said the President of the Board of Trade had stated that he would be willing to consider the question of a fixed limit if that was the general view of the Committee. He could not help thinking that the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman upon this Amendment threw a very strong and clear light upon the real effect of the clause. The right hon. Gentleman told them that if he had to choose between the acceptance of this Amendment, which provided for the Provisional Order procedure, and the clause he would not hesitate to drop the clause because he preferred the present arrangement. What was the difference between the present system and that proposed under the clause? The right hon. Gentleman said the clause would be confined to small undertakings. He wished to point out that such a work as the construction of a dock never could be a small undertaking. Supposing they were to proceed by a Provisional Order as provided by the Amendment instead of adopting the system provided for in the clause. In small matters which did not involve great sums of money or evoke serious opposition, he contended that procedure by Provisional Order would substantially be as good from the point of view of the Port Authority as procedure under this clause. When there was no opposition the Amendment could do no harm. The difficulties would arise in cases where works were proposed which involved serious opposition on the part of one or more interests concerned. In such a case if they were to proceed by a Provisional Order, no doubt that Order might be opposed, and in that case certain expenses would fall upon the Port Authority. By the clause as it stood the President of the Board of Trade contended that all those expenses would be got rid of. That might be so, but any interest which felt itself seriously aggrieved would have no remedy at all. The point was whether they were going to deprive persons, who might be vitally affected, of the remedy they would have if this Amendment were carried. In dealing with the matter under a Provisional Order instead of placing the interests in the hands of the Board made. The real object of the clause, certainly the object of resisting the amendment, was the natural desire of a Government Department to increase its authority. The right hon. Gentleman claimed that the Board of Trade must act impartially. That might be true, but it was not a sufficient reason for depriving large interests which might be very seriously prejudiced by works taken under this clause of any legal remedy. He hoped the hon. Member who had just spoken would be the only member opposite who would see that this was a very serious matter, and that the Amendment provided a way out of the difficulty.

WATERLOW (Islington, N.) said he would support the Amendment because the clause proposed by the Government was creating a precedent of very wide-reaching effect. If the authority to purchase land compulsorily was sanctioned in the case of the Port of London, many other large public bodies such as county councils, corporations, parish councils, and, in fact, all other public bodies would seek to have the power conferred upon them, and it would be perfectly justified in doing so for it. He was not aware of any single public authority which possessed such power outside the control of Parliament, and he was sure many county councils would be very glad to have a power of that kind. He did not see how the Government could resist granting the power to other public bodies if they had the precedent in the case of the Port Authority. This was a matter of great importance indeed. The Port Authority would be able to acquire land, but the clause did not state how much land they could acquire, where it was to be acquired, or whether it would have any effect upon it or not. It might be that under the clause they could acquire land, but there was only a small amount of land that had not been built upon of buildings upon it. He thought that they could acquire land belonging to the London County Council for an electric lighting station upon it. It might be an exaggeration, but it seemed to him on the face of it that this was a very wide-reaching proposal, and he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. ROWLANDS thought the President of the Board of Trade was beginning to realise the wide scope and the vast magnitude of the issues now before the House. They were proposing to give to the Port Authority and the Board of Trade huge powers of acquiring land in every direction, and it was time that some of the officials of the Board of Trade made a journey down the river to investigate the class of property which existed on either side of the river. Besides having the power to acquire land and construct great works, they were proposing to give to this new authority the power to levy, collect, and recover dues, rates, and tolls. The hon. Member for Brixton had just told the Committee how the position of those who had to provide the money for these schemes would be affected by the clause. He was speaking on behalf of a large number of persons who already paid heavy dues for their goods as they came up the river. Those interested in the trade of the river had already had some experience in regard of the payment of extra dues to keep the river in a proper condition under the administration of the Thames Conservancy Board. It was now proposed to give the new Port Authority power to saddle those traders with the cost of works which they might be unable to convince Parliament were entirely unnecessary if they had the opportunity of doing so. Therefore, it was very likely that such charges in the future would be very heavy upon the people who had to supply the money all along the Thames. It had been stated in evidence that there were many industries in the lower reaches of the river where goods not of a particularly valuable character were brought into the Port. They were bulky and cheap, but if even a very slightly increased charge was placed upon such goods by the new authority it was quite possible that that trade would be driven outside the Port of London. He trusted the President of the Board of Trade would see his way to concede this point, and then progress might be made with the measure.

SIR F. BANBURY said the President of the Board of Trade had advanced the argument that he was only claiming the same facilities for the Port of London as existed in the case of great Continental ports. That was a very bad argument because Continental ports and Continental nations were governed in a different way. Several hon. Members opposite had advanced some very cogent reasons for supporting the Amendment. The hon. Member for South-East Essex had told them very truly that these powers would deal very harshly with all the people who had invested large sums of money on property along the banks of the river. It had been argued that the privileges asked for had already been granted in the case of light railways and that if they once passed a provision of this sort it would constitute a valuable precedent for other things. It was because he did not want to create such a precedent that he was going to support the Amendment. It had been stated that light railways were in a different position. The promoters of light railways acquired land for the benefit of the neighbourhood, but here it was proposed to allow the Port Authority to buy land to the detriment of people who had invested money in the Port. The hon. Member for Brixton had said that the question had been argued from the point of view of the rights of property, but that there had been no mention of the point of view of those who would be affected by the increase of dues. If so, he thought that was due to an oversight on the part of hon. Members on that side of the House. The Amendment had been moved for two reasons. First of all, they did not want to give the Board of Trade on the application of the new Port Authority the enormous power of making an Order "authorising the construction and equipment of such docks, quays, wharves, jetties, or piers, and buildings, railways and other works in connection therewith as may be specified in the Order." He thought that the hon. Member for Brixton would see that they on that side agreed with him. Really the passing of the clause without the Amendment of his hon. friend opened up a vista from which he shrank with horror. There was absolutely nothing that the Port Authority and the Board of Trade could not do under the clause. The only safeguard he could see was that there would be an inquiry. An inquiry by whom? By the Board of Trade.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have repeatedly said that it would not be by the Board of Trade.

SIR F. BANBURY said the right hon. Gentleman would agree that it was a little difficult to know what was proposed seeing that the Amendment was not on the Paper. But that did not alter his position. He did not wish this power to be given to anybody. He desired to maintain the control of Parliament, and for that reason he supported the Amendment.

*MR. MORTON said he concurred with the last speaker that it was their duty to protect the rights and liberties of Members of Parliament who represented their constituents in these matters. If these were taken away, they might as well leave everything to be arranged by the Government or by a Committee consisting of a few Members of the House without their having an opportunity of submitting to the House the views which their constituents might desire to be urged. He was surprised to find a Liberal Government bringing forward a proposal to take away the rights of the representatives of the people in this House. He should not have been so much astonished if the proposal had come from the other side. He had no doubt that the Board of Trade had its sane moments, but how was he to know when it had those moments? Two years ago when a company of gentlemen proposed to construct a deep-water jetty on the south side of the river two or three miles above Gravesend with money which they themselves were finding, they applied to the Thames Conservancy for the usual licence. The Thames Conservancy were willing to grant the application, but the Board of Trade said that they ought to come to Parliament for power to construct the jetty. What these gentlemen proposed to do was a small matter compared with the enormous undertakings which the Port Authority with the sanction of rd of Trade would be empowered out if the clause was passed Amendment. If that was the of the Board of Trade in a small of that sort, it appeared to him liament ought to have an oppor- f considering the proposals made Port Authority in order that they e able to judge whether the of the people whom they repre- ere properly protected. He was ed that the Board of Trade did way at once and accept the ent. Why did the Board of sh to protect the Port Authority were something sacred? The ee were not allowed to con- ether the docks ought to be d or not. He objected to the thority being able on a Depart- Order to do what was provided he clause without coming to nt.

ILBERT PARKER said that he looked into the clause the appointed he was. The hon. the Member for the City of ad pointed out that the setting ommission of inquiry would not sufficient safeguard, and he osed to agree with him. It e noticed that subsection (a) Port Authority absolute freedom with respect to the construction ment of docks, quays, wharves, iers, buildings, railways, and rks, which might be specified ler made by the Board of Trade, ection (3) of the new clause, that where land was to be compulsorily the sanction of it would be necessary if it to the Board of Trade that ld be applied for.

URCHILL: The hon. Gentle- duly alarmed. The clause only the Port Authority to construct land within the area which o them.

ILBERT PARKER said it was eat power to give to the Port . Suppose that the construc- cks, wharves, jetties, piers, and y the Port Authority meant competition with commercial and indus- trial organisations — suppose that its scheme conflicted with interests already established and contiguous to the Port Authority's interests—was the Port Authority to have independent power, on the Order made by the Board of Trade, to carry out its scheme? The right hon. Gentleman had not thrown any light on the question. The Port Authority would be engaged in a com- mercial enterprise intent upon making its business pay, and it would compete with various interests which did not enjoy the powers proposed to be conferred on the Port Authority. Did not the Committee see the extremely dangerous position that would set up? If it was right to protect the interests of land- owners by sending down a Commissioner where it was proposed to acquire land was it not also right to safeguard in some way commercial interests of various kinds which under the Bill at present had no protection whatever? He sub- mitted that if the Committee allowed the clause to pass without inserting the words of the Amendment, the House would have cause to regret a grave dereliction of duty. What earthly reason could there be for not accepting the Amendment? This was a question of the gravest importance to the commercial interests of the river.

MR. MYER (Lambeth, N.) said he was heartily in favour of the Port of London Bill, but as the representative of a constituency which had large manufac- turing interests which were dependent on cheap freightage he was opposed to any proposal which would have the effect of increasing the cost of production. In his constituency there were potteries which used large quantities of coal, clay, and various other materials, and if a charge was going to be put on them the cost of production would be greatly increased, and the new authority instead of doing good to the Port of London would do harm. This proposal reminded him of some great octopus, which would come sailing up the river, put out its ten- tacles, and seize land on all sides.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: It does not touch a yard of land.

MR. MYER agreed it did not touch a yard of land, but it touched the materials which were brought up the river. Any charges which the Port Authority might put on goods coming up the river would touch those industries. If the Port Authority got this land without coming to Parliament for powers, they would charge dues on everything that came up the river.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE : Not at all.

MR. MYER said he might be wrong, and he would be glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman's explanation. He, at any rate, regarded it as a very serious matter indeed. He might almost say that he had a mandate from a great number of the manufacturers in his constituency to represent their fears of the possible increase in the dues upon the goods on which their livelihood depended.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said his hon. friend had made a speech on the question of the general charges on the river. That had nothing to do with the question before the Committee. The hon. Member said he had a mandate from certain people, but he was too late in redeeming his promise. What was the new clause? He wished his hon. friend had taken the trouble to read it.

MR. MYER : What about subsection (c) ?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said that if his hon. friend had taken the trouble to read the clause he would have seen that his speech was hopelessly irrelevant. The object of the clause was that whenever there was an extension of existing works or whenever land was required for the erection of new works they should have cheap and expeditious methods of acquiring land. He should have thought the hon. Member for Dartford would have been the first to sympathise with an object of that sort. No one had done more than the hon. Member to support the policy of the clause, but when it came to the putting of it into operation he found that there was difficulty in the case. When the Government proposed to put into operation the doctrine which he had put into their minds he jumped up and objected in the interest of some factories in his constituency. The hon. Member pointed to a particular manufacture which he thought would be damaged by the proposition.

MR. ROWLANDS said that thousands of working men were employed in the manufacture to which he had referred.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE agreed that it was in the interests of the working men that there should be cheap facilities for developing the river. He should have thought that the hon. Member for Dartford would have been the first to sympathise with an object of that sort. Was it in the interests of the working men that the Port Authority should spend thousands of pounds upon Parliamentary lawyers and experts, and hold up the development and extension of works for years and years, because of the expense of Parliamentary procedure could not be faced? They had heard from the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, who objected to the Second Reading, that what happened in such cases was that these little transactions were set aside until a sufficient number of them had accumulated before an application was made to Parliament for powers.

LORD R. CECIL said he did not think that the right hon. Gentleman was quoting him correctly.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said he was putting in his own words what the noble Lord had said substantially.

LORD R. CECIL said that what he had stated was that a railway company asserted these small transactions in the Omnibus Bill, and that practically speaking they came to Parliament every year or almost every year.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said that he had all very well in the case of a small company which might have a system of 400 or 500 miles in extent. But the Port Authority might have only one in three or four years, and it might have to wait for perhaps ten years before had such an accumulation of these as would make it worth while to go to Parliament for a Bill. There was no doubt of the fact that if the Port Authority were compelled to come to Parliament every time a few acres of land were wanted it would retard the development of the Port. Subsection (c) did not mean that the moment they built a jetty on land which they acquired that tolls would be exacted upon all the ships in the river. He did not think that any sane man could put an interpretation of that kind on the subsection. It simply meant that if a jetty were built and a ship came to that particular jetty, it would be subjected to the charges for the use of the jetty. It was not like a Railway Extension Bill which contained a rate clause, and that rate clause was only operative on the particular extension. The clause could not alter the general charges on the river; that would be preposterous.

SIR F. BANBURY said that, as he understood the matter, the money for the extension or for other works would have to be raised, and if the revenue from the works or extension did not pay interest on the capital expended, the general provisions of the Act would then come into force, and the dues would have to be increased.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said that the clause simply meant that whenever they made an extension the charges which were applicable to the rest of the river should also be applied to that particular extension. This was a clause for the purpose of acquiring land for extension, nothing more. [An Hon Member: Then strike out the other words.] What was the use of acquiring land unless they were allowed to make some use of it? They might as well not buy the land at all. An hon. Member suggested that all they ought to do was to take power to acquire the land, but not power to make use of it. The hon. Member for Sutherland said that the Port Authority should proceed by Provisional Order; but that meant that it would have to go upstairs where it would get exactly the same opposition as was got on an ordinary Private Bill, when it was the interest of every one to pile up and accumulate expenses. All this had been explained and debated over and over again. All that was wanted was a cheap and expeditious method of acquiring land for an extension, and in his opinion there was adequate and complete limitation of the exercise of the powers of the Board of Trade by subsection (3) of the clause.

SIR WILLIAM BULL (Hammersmith) said he was deeply interested in the Bill and was anxious to see it passed. The point which the Committee had been discussing was very largely the outcome of a compromise which had been arrived at. The five London Members of the House of Commons on the Joint Committee thought that this was an honest attempt to get the best machinery for the working of a huge undertaking of this kind. He would point out that the inquiry would be entirely a judicial one, and that the Board of Trade did not suggest that any one particular person should be appointed to conduct the inquiry. They only said that it was to be an independent person. It would not only be an inquiry with regard to the land, but also as to whether any injury would be done to the vendor of the land. It was not to be supposed that the Board of Trade would appoint any one man to conduct this inquiry who was not of the highest character. As a way out of the present difficulty he suggested that the Board of Trade might agree to some limit in the case of money or land or both. The limit for land might be ten acres, which would be sufficient for a dock of considerable size, and the money limit might be £25,000 or £30,000.

SIR F. BANBURY thought that the hon. Member for Lambeth was right in his interpretation of subsection (a) that it might involve the acquisition of land for railways away from the riverside works.

MR. CHURCHILL said that he was anxious to respond as far as he possibly could to the appeal made by his hon. friend the Member for Hammersmith, whose interest and attention had been lavished upon the Bill with very great advantage to the measure at every stage. But he did not think they would be making a good Bill, or putting good machinery into the Act of Parliament if they were to insert a sharp, fixed limit either with regard to acreage or with regard to money. They could not stereotype or codify these transactions in that way. He was, however, prepared to defer to a certain extent to those who used the argument that these transactions were being withheld from Parliament, but while he said that he must insist that the Minister representing the Board of Trade in this House was responsible to Parliament for every act done by his Department. In order to make progress with the Bill he was prepared to insert a new subsection after subsection (3) providing that: "An Order other than a Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade under this section for the acquisition of land shall not take effect until a draft thereof has been laid for thirty days on the Tables of both Houses of Parliament, and if either House during these thirty days presents an address to His Majesty against the draft, no further proceedings shall be taken thereon, but without prejudice to the laying of a new Order." That would be following out the suggestion which fell earlier in the afternoon from hon. Members on those benches, and it would keep the whole of this procedure within the action of Parliament. If Parliament did not wish to admit the dispensing power, or thought it was an improper exercise of it, it would be within the power of Parliament by a most simple and effective procedure to terminate the whole transaction.

SIR F. BANBURY suggested that in order to expedite matters they should divide on the question of Provisional Orders and discuss the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion afterwards.

*MR. WALTER GUINNESS said the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman did something to meet their case, but did not go half far enough in regard to the point as to having a Provisional Order. Neither the right hon. Gentleman nor the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to realise the strong objection they had to sub-heads (a) and (b).

*THE CHAIRMAN said they were not discussing sub-heads (a) and (b). They only came in as pertaining to this particular Amendment.

MR. WALTER GUINNESS pointed out that if his Amendment was rejected in line 10, and as he took it, it would be, it would be out of order for him to move to put in the word "Provisional" before the word "Order" in line 14.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Oh, yes, of course, it would; it applies to the whole of the paragraph.

*MR. WALTER GUINNESS said this was the only opportunity of discussing the question of having a Provisional Order to deal with the construction or equipment of "docks, quays, wharves, jetties or piers and buildings, railways and other works in connection therewith." But he would only say one word. He did not think either of the right hon. Gentlemen who had spoken for the Government had attached so much importance as they ought to this matter, and although they had an illusory compromise in regard to subhead (b) they had been offered no compromise in regard to sub-heads (a) or (c). The Government had ignored that and the local authorities would be very much affected by that, and he could imagine the House being affected by it. What was to prevent the Port Authority from acquiring St. Thomas' Hospital and putting up creaking cranes there.

MR. CHURCHILL said he was very anxious to meet the wishes of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and suggested that if he were to leave out from his proposed new subsection the words "for the acquisition of land," then the Amendment would apply to all those matters. He was ready to do that.

SIR F. BANBURY said that they must divide on the question of the Provisional Order.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Mr. Joseph Pease and Master of Elibank.

MR. WHITEHEAD said he would not move the two Amendments next on the Paper, but he proposed to move the one suggesting in line 16, after the word "land" the insertion of the words "and subject to such conditions and reservations." The Amendment was more of a drafting character than anything else. While the Commissioners were to direct that the land should be purchased they had no power to indicate conditions or insert in the Order reservations in favour of the landowner. He thought it was clear that the clause should be amended in this direction.

Amendment proposed to the proposed new clause—

"In line 16, after the word 'land,' to insert the words 'and subject to such conditions and reservations.'"—(Mr. Whitehead.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHURCHILL was understood to say that this would be a dangerous Amendment, and he certainly should not claim on behalf of the Board of Trade or any other Department the powers which his hon. friend would entrust to them. It was much better that the matter should be fought right out. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CHURCHILL formally moved in fulfilment of a promise made earlier in the discussion an Amendment withholding from the scope of the clause all lands which had been acquired under statutory powers.

Amendment proposed to the proposed new clause—

"In line 31, to insert after the word 'Greenwich,' the words 'or which has been acquired by the owners thereof under statute.'"—(Mr. Churchill.)

Amendment agreed to.

SIR F. BANBURY said, to put himself in order, he would move a proviso standing on the Paper in the name of the right hon. Member for the Epping division of Essex, to the effect that nothing in the Bill should empower the Board of Trade to authorise the purchase and taking of any land belonging to any railway company, used as part of or in connection with their railway and acquired under Acts relating to their undertaking. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman had moved an Amendment dealing with this question, but he was afraid he did not hear the words which were not on the Paper. He therefore moved this in order to give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of explaining the matter. If the Amendment were covered he would withdraw it, but he begged to move it formally.

Amendment proposed to the proposed new clause—

"In line 36, at end, to insert the words 'Provided also that nothing herein contained shall empower the Board of Trade to authorise the purchase and taking of any land belonging to any railway company and used by such company as a part of or in connection with their railway and acquired by such company under any of the provisions of the Act relating to their undertaking.'"—(Sir F. Banbury.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHURCHILL explained that the Amendment which had already been inserted had the effect of withdrawing from the scope of the clause all lands which were possessed under statutory authority and which had been acquired under any statute, and that was the better way of doing it. They had not named railways, although railways were included.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CHURCHILL formally moved another Amendment, also promised earlier in the debate, viz., to insert at the beginning of subsection (3), words to the effect that before formulating an Order under this subsection the Board of Trade should appoint an impartial person to hold a public inquiry on its behalf.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 45, at the beginning of subsection (3) to insert the words 'Before formulating an Order under this subsection the Board of Trade shall appoint an impartial person to hold an inquiry on its behalf.'"—(Mr. Churchill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR GILBERT PARKER inquired whether the right hon. Gentleman would not only include in that Amendment a scheme for the acquisition of land but also any other scheme, such as one for the construction of docks. He did not think the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman would be satisfactory unless the change was made so that the inquiry would include the general items.

MR. CHURCHILL was understood to assent to the proposal.

MR. RENWICK asked the right hon. Gentleman to insert words giving all the people interested power to give evidence before the inquiry.

MR. CHURCHILL: Yes: there will be a public inquiry.

AN HON. MEMBER thought it might be as well to insert some words, because only the other day under the working of the Small Holdings Act great hardship was caused by interested parties not being allowed to be heard by counsel. The insertion of words could do no harm.

MR. RENWICK expressed the hope that the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to insert some words.

MR. CHURCHILL thought "public inquiry" was sufficient. If interested parties were not heard they would be able to make a protest, and if that protest was audible the whole system of our Government institutions would come into operation. He was very unwilling to cumber the Bill with particular drafting.

*THE CHAIRMAN said he understood that the right hon. Gentleman was willing to move an Amendment or accept an Amendment striking out these words. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would withdraw the Amendment and move it in a new form.

MR. CHURCHILL: Certainly.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed to the proposed new clause—

"To leave out subsection (3), and to insert the words '(3) Before making an order under this section the Board of Trade shall appoint an impartial person to hold a public inquiry on their behalf, and if he reports or if it appears to the Board of Trade that by reason of the extent or situation of any land proposed to be acquired compulsorily, or the purposes for which such land is used, or any other circumstances, the land ought not to be acquired compulsorily without the sanction of Parliament the order of the Board shall be provisional only and shall not have effect unless confirmed by Parliament.'"—(Mr. Churchill.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed—

"After the words last inserted, to insert the words '(4) Any order other than a Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade under this section shall not take effect until a draft thereof has lain for thirty days on the Table of both Houses of Parliament, and if either House during those thirty days presents an address to His Majesty against the draft no further proceedings shall be taken thereon but without prejudice to the making of a new order.'"—(Mr. Churchill.)

MR. RENWICK asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would insert after the words "thirty days" the words "while Parliament is sitting."

MR. CHURCHILL understood that such an order could only lie for thirty days on the Table while Parliament was in session. If the House was not sitting it could not lie, but this matter had come upon him rather unexpectedly, and in his desire to meet the wishes of the House, he would accept such an Amendment.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment—

"In line 3, after the word 'days,' to insert the words 'during the session of Parliament.'"—
(Mr. Renwick.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

*MR. MORTON, in moving a new clause relating to tolls and levies, said that at the present time the Government ships had full use of the waterway and paid nothing toward the upkeep of the Port or the dredging of the fairway, and his object in asking this clause to be inserted was that these ships should, with others, pay a fair share towards the cost. The right hon. Gentleman might tell them it could not be done, but the same thing was done in the case of rates on buildings, and as it was done in that case, he asked that it should be done in the case of the river. He knew that the Government said in the case of the rates on buildings that it was a matter of grace; but it was sufficient to show that it was done. In his opinion the Government ships ought to pay their fair share towards the cost of the upkeep of the Port in the same way as others paid. He begged to move.

New clause—

"Notwithstanding anything contained in the Act of 54 Geo. III., c. 159, the Thames Conservancy Act, 1894, or any Act amending the same, any rates, dues, tolls, fees, or other charges leviable under this Act, or under any Provisional Order made thereunder, or under any Act incorporated therewith, shall be chargeable to and payable by the Crown upon the same conditions and in the same manner as they are chargeable to and payable by other bodies or persons."—(Mr. Morton.)

Brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

MR. CHURCHILL expressed some doubt whether, as this would impose a charge upon the Exchequer, it was an order. He would simply say that the passage of His Majesty's ships up the Thames without payment of charges was only the practice followed in every port in the kingdom, and it was the invariable practice of Parliament to allow the exemption. The Bill made the new authority heirs to all the rights and obligations of the present authorities and it would not be in accordance with the principle of the Bill to insert such a clause.

MR. MYER felt he must support any proposal that would tend to make London a cheaper port. It was not quite the case that in all ports the Government were free from such charges. In Portsmouth Harbour the cost of dredging, buoying, and clearing the fairway was largely borne by the Government. As such a clause as this would lighten the burden of London and make the port a cheap port, he was in favour of it.

*MR. MORTON said the objections were similar to those urged against the payment of rates by the Crown, but finally the Government yielded with regard to that as they said an act of grace, and he would have been satisfied if he could have got an assurance in that direction. He did not intend to divide on the clause.

Proposed new clause negatived.

*MR. MORTON, in moving a new clause to provide for dock and river accounts to be kept separately, said that this was possibly the most important clause that had yet been proposed. In it he asked that the accounts in connection with the docks and the river should be kept separate. This matter had been discussed by the Joint Committee and had only been defeated by two votes, and that was at the instigation of the dock companies who apparently did not want the true state of affairs to be known. The clause provided that the accounts of all the money spent on the improvements of the docks should be kept separately from those of the money spent on the improvements of the river, and that the dock receipts should be kept separate from the river receipts. He was astonished that there should be any objection to the clause. Certainly no reason for such an objection could be given except the desire of the dock companies that their profits or losses should be kept secret. At the present time they wanted to tax the food of the people in order to make up the loss that must occur with regard to the docks. This principle was carried out at Liverpool in regard to the Mersey Docks and Harbour. Section 55 of the Act governing the Port provided that no portion of the Conservancy receipts for the use of the river should be applied to dock expenses, and by asking for the insertion of this clause he was only asking for what Parliament insisted upon in the case of the Mersey docks. It could hardly therefore be considered an extraordinary proposition. In the case of London the chief source of revenue was the power to charge dues on all goods coming into London, and that depended so far as the dock companies were concerned upon whether they were brought into the docks or handled in the river. That was another reason for this separation of accounts, because a good deal depended upon the amount of business that was handled in the river. Up to about twenty years ago there were two different authorities for the government of the Thames. The old Conservancy (the Corporation) had charge from Southend to Staines, and for the upper portions of the Thames there was a Board composed of all the owners of the land adjoining the river. That was found to be a bad system. What did Parliament do then? Parliament insisted that there must be separate accounts kept of the upper and the lower river. These had been kept ever since, and, speaking as a member of the Conservancy, he could say that there was no difficulty at all in keeping them separate and the very fact that they were separate was of great use to them in carrying out the work and the control of the river. He was astonished that the President of the Board of Trade advised the Joint Committee to object to this, and he had not heard why, except the statement of Sir E. Clarke, counsel for the London and India Docks Company, who said that the Amendment to give them separate accounts would be fatal to the Bill; that it interfered with the structure of the Bill in a serious manner. What that all meant he had never heard and probably never would hear, and he could not understand the necessity for all this secrecy, unless there was something like the engineer's report that they were afraid even to show the Joint Committee. The dock companies had a curious power over the Joint Committee, excepting the Members of the House of Lords on the Committee, who were not frightened so easily. He was sorry that that Committee was not more independent and did not take into consideration that it was there representing at any rate the people of London, if not the people of the country, and not simply acting as agents for the dock companies, to get rid of their shares, he supposed, and unload them on to the public. He would be very pleased if the President of the Board of Trade would at once give way and agree to the clause, because it would astonish him if the right hon. Gentleman had any good reason why they should not have the accounts kept separately, as was done in the case of the Mersey and other Port authorities, and even in the case of the Port of London itself. That being so, he begged to move the new clause.

New clause proposed—

“The following accounts shall be kept separately by the Port Authority in addition to any other accounts which are by this Act prescribed to be kept as separate accounts, that is to say:—(1) An account (to be called the Docks Capital Account) showing: (a) The amount of port stock created and issued in substitution for the existing stocks of the dock companies; (b) the amount of money expended by the Port Authority on capital account in improving the docks, basins, cuts, and entrances by this Act transferred to the Port Authority or in constructing and equipping new docks, basins, cuts, entrances, and other works or otherwise on capital account in improving the Port of London. (2) An account (to be called the Docks Revenue Account): (a) Of all sums received in respect of vessels entering, lying in, departing from, or otherwise using the docks, basins, cuts, or entrances from time to time vested in the Port Authority other than the duties of tonnage prescribed in Section 155 of the Thames Conservancy Act, 1894, as amended by Section 7 of the Thames Conservancy Act, 1905, and by this Act and in respect of all goods imported into or exported from such docks, basins, cuts, and entrances, and in respect of services rendered or accommodation provided by the Port Authority within the same and of all other revenue received by the Port Authority in respect thereof (to be called Dock Receipts); (b) of all sums expended in respect of the maintenance, management, and improvement of the Port of London, including all sums paid by way of interests on or redemption of money expended on Dock Capital Account (to be called Dock Expenditure). (3) An account (to be called the River Capital Account) showing: (a) The amount of port stock created and issued under this Act in substitution for Thames Conservancy Redeemable 'A' Debenture Stock; (b) such amount of the money expended by the Port authority on capital account as, in the opinion of the auditor of the Port Authority, is capital expenditure necessitated by the requirements of persons and vessels not using the said docks, basins, cuts, and entrances of the Port authority. (4) An account (to be called the River Revenue Account): (a) Of all sums received from the said duties of tonnage and in respect of all vessels, goods, services, and accommodation, other than the vessels, goods, services, and accommodation referred to in subsection (2) (a) of this section, and of all other revenue received by the Port Authority (to be called river receipts); (b) of all sums paid: (1) by way of interest on or redemption of money expended on River Capital Account; (2) such proportion of the expenditure referred to in subsection (2) (b) of this section as, in the opinion of the auditor of the Port Authority, is expenditure necessitated by the requirements of persons and vessels not using the said docks, basins, cuts, and entrances of the Port Authority (to be called river expenditure). (5) The dock expenditure shall be defrayed out of the dock receipts and the river expenditure shall be defrayed out of the river receipts, and no portion of the river receipts shall be applied in aid of the dock expenditure."—(Mr. Morton.)

Brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the clause be read a second time."

MR. CHURCHILL: The sting of the proposed new clause is in its tail, in subsection (5). The effect of saying that no surplus on the river trade shall be devoted to balancing a deficit on the dock trade, or vice versa, would be seriously to impair the financial structure of the Bill and would upset the bargain which the House has decided to enter upon. I therefore say that it is impossible for me to accept that Amendment. I think I have already gone a long way to meet the views of hon. Gentlemen on this subject when I accepted the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Islington, which does arrange that the receipts from Port rates shall be separately published, but I think it would be impracticable to go beyond that. I do not think the case of the Mersey Board is on all fours with that of London. There is no free water trade in respect of goods in the docks at Liverpool, and the passing trade on the way up to Manchester and elsewhere does not in any way participate in the hospitalities of the Port in the same way as in London. The Amendment was very carefully considered by the Committee, and after much examination they rejected it; and that is the only course I find open to me.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said he was in agreement with the right hon. Gentleman in regard to subsection (5), but he really thought it extraordinary that the right hon. Gentleman was not able to accept the rest of the Amendment. The position regarding the Port of London was a very difficult one. The right hon. Gentleman knew that they had really two sets of interests on the river, the dock interests and the river interests. They were sharply distinct. The Government, he had no doubt, wished to co-ordinate and to harmonise those two sets of interests, but that could not be done so long as there was a strong element of suspicion on the part of the various interests which were competitive, though not opposed, to the docks. It had been common talk outside the House that the right hon. Gentleman was going to accept this Amendment. It was the general impression among those representing the river interests that this separation of the two accounts, the docks capital account and the docks revenue account from the river capital account and the river revenue account, was going to be agreed to, and it seemed to him to be an entirely reasonable suggestion. He thought it would be subversive of the best interests of the river ultimately if they were to say that revenue proceeding from river interests should only be devoted to certain specific river interests, and the same with regard to the docks; but if the accounts were simply kept separate, the public—the commercial public, the river public—would be able to see exactly what the position was, and could from year to year find out the proportions of expenditure.

MR. CHURCHILL: I think the point is sufficiently met by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Islington's proviso, in Clause 23, subsection (1), which says that—

"All receipts from port rates on goods discharged from, or taken on board, ships not within the dock premises of the Port Authority shall be shown separately from the receipts from port rates on goods discharged from or taken on board ships within such premises."

Why does that not meet the case?

*MR. MORTON: I am advised that that does not meet the case at all.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said it did not meet the whole case. In that clause they had only the showing of the revenue, whereas in the Amendment of the hon. Member they had the capital accounts separated, whereby they could see exactly what the position of the original capital was, and its relation to the subsequent revenue under the new Act. He did not think the Amendment was acceptable to the Committee as it stood, and therefore, in view of the great difficulty of the situation, the dissatisfaction that existed, the suspicion and uncertainty that existed among those representing the river interests, he thought the right hon. Gentleman would do well to consider the advisability of adding to the clause that the dock capital accounts should be kept separately as well as the revenue accounts.

MR. CHURCHILL thought the proper place to raise that question would be on Clause 23.

SIR GILBERT PARKER asked if, in view of what the right hon. Gentleman had said, he would give any kind of assurance that when the matter came up on the Report stage he would assent to this division.

MR. CHURCHILL: When we reach the proper place in the Bill where this should be discussed, I will give my most undivided attention to any statement the hon. Gentleman may then make, and will do the fullest justice to any argument he may advance.

SIR GILBERT PARKER asked whether he understood that the view of the right hon. Gentleman, as at present advised, was that it would be inexpedient so far as could be seen to separate the dock capital account from the river capital account. That would govern his own action in the matter very largely.

MR. CHURCHILL: I should suppose that the proper distribution of the capital account between the dock trade and the river interests would emerge from the regularly compiled accounts of the Port Authority. So far as the receipts are concerned, there is an Amendment that they shall be kept separately, but so far as the expenditure is concerned, the separation of those accounts, I am informed, is impossible.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.) thought it well to interrupt this question and answer proceeding between the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Gentleman. He desired to acknowledge with all gratitude the concession made to him at an earlier stage, but he must point out that it was of a very limited character and did not go at all the length of the clause now before them. The clause was, except as regarded one part of it, a most excellent clause, and it had been fully discussed in another place. It was like clauses which existed in other statutes, and he thought it required more consideration than it had received in that debate. There was one fault in the argument of the hon. Member who moved the clause; he did not say a word in defence of subsection (5), and of course he was pounced upon and torn in pieces by the right hon. Gentleman for that neglect. He argued all from his first four sections. The clause was entirely devoted to the keeping of the accounts separate, except subsection (5), which was dragged in to dictate as to the source from which certain money should be paid. It was irrelevant to the clause altogether, and his hon. friend did not give a single reason in support of that subsection. His right hon. friend, if he might say so, made just the same kind of mistake; he devoted his answer entirely to subsection (5). He would like to suggest that they should leave out the tail of the clause, and that the right hon. Gentleman should accept the clause without subsection (5). He regarded it as of the very greatest importance. He had taken some pains to set out how the accounts of local authorities which were set up should be kept, and there was never a case in which it would be of greater importance than to the mercantile community of London that they should have these accounts kept in clear form, and the receipts and expenditure under all heads kept perfectly distinct. He did not think a single objection to the first four subsections had been stated, and he would suggest, as a step that would go far to promote harmony, that the right hon. Gentleman should accept the new clause, leaving out subsection (5). He pressed that upon him with some confidence, because he had already been the recipient of a small favour with regard to the dues on goods. There did not appear to him to be a single item in this long clause that would not be necessary and useful to the mercantile community of London and very helpful to the Board of Trade in watching the affairs of this new authority hereafter.

MR. RENWICK said he supported the clause. He had listened to the whole of the debate and had come to the conclusion that the Committee had never recognised the importance of this matter to the two interests affected, namely, the dock interest and the river interest. They could never be reconcilable, and the extraordinary thing in regard to them was that no improvement of the river or docks contemplated by the Bill could be of any use or benefit whatever to the ships which used the river. They were perfectly satisfied with the present accommodation and with the depth of water, and they were naturally jealous that in any improvements of the docks—and there would be very large improvements, with an enormous outlay possibly—their interests should not be sacrificed, and therefore they were most anxious to have these accounts kept separately. He could understand the right hon. Gentleman if he said he would agree to the clause, say, for a period of five or ten years. This was a new authority that was to be set up, and no one knew what amount of money the authority would spend, but they all knew very well that the amount spent would be very large, and naturally those whose interests were affected adversely by the money spent were anxious that the river interests should not be handicapped to provide funds to improve the docks. Therefore, it was absolutely necessary that the accounts should be kept separately. He was sincerely sorry that in the whole of the debate the Committee had never recognised the enormous value of the riverside trade. If any Member of the Committee were to take a walk in that direction on a Monday or a Tuesday morning he would see the Pool and the wharves there crowded with shipping, none of which used the docks. The accommodation for that shipping had been provided by private enterprise, but the owners of these wharves did not come and ask for money to develop their wharves. They did it themselves, and naturally they said that if this new authority was to deal with the docks it should not be at the expense of the riverside trade. He therefore appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to accept this very reasonable Amendment, including subsection (5), which set forth that no portion of the money that was raised by the revenue of the river should be used in improving the docks, or vice versa.

MR. CHURCHILL: I am afraid I cannot entertain the Amendment. The whole matter was considered by the Committee who rejected a clause almost identical with this after very careful examination. The Chairman said—

“We feel we can safely rely on the Board of Trade to give all the information useful to those who have introduced this Amendment.”

That refers to the power which the Board of Trade have under Section 21 of prescribing the form of the accounts. We shall prescribe the form of these accounts in the manner best calculated to give the fullest information to traders and the general public that can be given them without unduly hampering with pettifogging and vexatious restrictions the work of the authority. I would ask the Committee to come to a decision upon this matter now. We have made very slow progress to-day, and I earnestly submit to the Committee that I have done my best to avoid points of dissatisfaction. I should still be ready to consider any Amendment which may be moved with a view to making concessions wherever possible, having regard to the position of the Bill.

MR. MYER said there could be no doubt that there might be an attempt on the part of the new Port Authority to put these charges upon the goods which went to the wharves and private properties on each side of the river which had been put up at great expense by the riparian owners. There was an enormous amount of trade depending upon their free access to these wharves, and he regretted that he could not support the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. CHURCHILL rose in his place and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, "That the clause be read a second time."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Master of Elibank and Mr.
 Herbert Lewis.

Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report the Bill, as amended, to the House."

And, it being after Five of the Clock, and objection being taken to further Proceeding, the Chairman proceeded to interrupt the Business.

Whereupon Mr. CHURCHILL rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

MR. MACARTHUR (Liverpool, Kirkdale), on a point of order, said he had a new clause to be introduced on the Report stage. Would that be precluded by the Motion to report the Bill?

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member does not seem to know that we are discussing merely the new clauses in Committee which were on the Paper on 12th November. Our proceedings have nothing whatever to do with the Report Stage.

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Question, "That the Chairman do report the Bill, as amended, to the House," put accordingly, and agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 390.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS (ADMISSION OF STRANGERS).

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Rules and Regulations under which Strangers are admitted to this House and its precincts; and to report whether any alterations in the same are expedient.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.—(Mr. Joseph Pease.)

Whereupon Mr. SPEAKER, in pursuance of the Order of the House of 31st July adjourned the House without Question put.

Adjourned at thirteen minutes after Five o'clock, till Monday next.
